As we progress, sir, the authorities in favor of a liberal construction of this treaty are multiplied upon us. "If the promiser has neglected to examine the matter, or has been careless in expressing his meaning, he will be bound to repair the damage which another has sustained on that account." (Grotius.) We are the promiser. Spain expected, and stipulated for full satisfaction to her injured subjects. It is amply provided for in the Spanish copy of the treaty. Those subjects have relied on our promise, and have sustained a heavy damage by that reliance: for we may freely conclude, that as this is the single stipulation in favor of Spain, without this, in its fullest comprehension, she would never have ceded the Floridas. This rule is again and again pressed on us by the books. We are further told by Grotius, 2, 16, 7, that "no inconsiderable light may be thrown on the meaning of an expression, from the circumstances of its being used by the same persons, to express the same intentions, on other similar occasions, and from its relation to what goes before, and what follows, the place where it stands." "We must consider the whole discourse together, in order perfectly to conceive the sense of it, and give to each expression not so much the signification which it may individually admit of, as that which it ought to have, from the context and spirit of the discourse." (Vat. 2, 17, 285.) Now, sir, it will be seen by reference to the treaty itself, and to the negotiations which preceded it, that the object which both parties had in view, was a full and final settlement of all demands and differences, mutually claimed and existing (up to that day) between them. Spain had injured our commerce herself, and to a greater extent had suffered it to be injured in her very ports by French privateers. Our vessels, thus seized, were subsequently condemned as prizes by the Spanish Court of Admiralty. All this was previous to 1802. In addition to this, we claimed satisfaction for the suspension of our right of deposit at New Orleans in that year. In a word, every item in the account of the United States against Spain, was previous in its date to 1802. To this account, Spain produces her offset, and the items of that offset are specified in the final renunciation she makes at the conclusion of the settlement of what she had claimed.

Finally, the renunciation extends "to all the claims of his Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of his Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of 1802, or which may have been made," &c. Here Spain renounces that for which she had claimed satisfaction, to wit: all acts done by the United States to her subjects subsequent to 1802, and previous to the date of the treaty, as well for the operations of our armies in 1812 and 1814, as for the year 1818. And for what consideration is this renunciation made? For the satisfaction promised by the United States in the clause which follows. The debt from Spain to the United States was due in 1802. The last item in the account was of that date, and in a settlement in full in 1819, we are told that offsets of 1812 and '14 are too old to be allowed. "And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas." Here it is evident that the word "recent," in this sentence, was used as synonymous with the word "late" in the next; and it is on this synonyme of these two adjectives, that the Committee of Foreign Affairs have based their opinion. Let us apply this rule of construction as well to the Spaniards as to ourselves. Suppose Spain were now to demand satisfaction at our hands for the invasion of her territory in 1812 and '14, by Matthews and Mitchell, by Bankhouse and Bankhead. Suppose she were to say to us, that it is true she had "renounced all claim to indemnity for any of the recent events or transactions, &c. in the Floridas," but that renunciation is co-extensive with the satisfaction we make to her subjects; and as that satisfaction is confined to the "operations" of 1818, in West Florida, so is the renunciation. Suppose she reply to us further, in our own language, that "recent" and "late" are the same, that "late" means the last "operations:" when we say to her that the operations of Bankhouse and Bankhead, in 1814, were the very last in East Florida, she is ready to refute the doctrine by a quotation of our words, "they apply only to 1818," we have renounced for that year alone; we have renounced to the same extent that you have paid us, and we now claim the balance. Can any thing be more just and equitable, and, at the same time, more ridiculous, than this would be? And yet this interpretation, so ridiculous in the mouth of Spain, the United States have adopted as the rule by which they will be governed.

"The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which, by due course of law, shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers, and individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of the American army in Florida."

Thus stands the interpretation of these two sections of the ninth article of the treaty with Spain. Spain renounces all claim to indemnity for injuries done to her citizens for "recent transactions." We promise to make satisfaction for all injuries done by "late operations;" the renunciation is construed to embrace every act done previous to the year 1819; the satisfaction is construed to extend to acts of the preceding year alone. "Recent" means whatever is done before that time, without any limitation whatsoever; "late" means nothing more than what was done one year before it; and this is the unbounded odds of the word recent in one sentence, and the word late in the other. This is the odds in the meaning of two synonymous words, when one is meant as a security to us, and the other as an obligation upon us. It is true, what we are told by the books, "that favorable promises are those which contain an equality of terms, or which bear some relation to the common good; the magnitude and extent of which increases the favor of the promise." (Grotius.) "Remedial statutes, says Christian, Notes to Blackstone, Introduction, page 87, "must be construed according to the spirit; for, in giving relief against fraud, or in furtherance and extension of natural right and justice, the judge may safely go even beyond that which existed in the minds of those who framed it." "In a case of doubt we should, in preference, pursue that line of conduct by which we are least exposed to deviate from the principles of equity." (Vattel, B. 2, C. 17, Sec. 306.)

Now, sir, I think I have shown that the construction for which I contend is, "in furtherance and extension of natural right and justice;" and I do solemnly believe that I could show that it was "giving relief against fraud;" but I forbear.

I come now to the great rule of interpretation—the intention of the parties to the deed. If this cannot be inferred from the object they had in view, nor from the principles of universal justice, nor "from the same or a synonymous word used in another place," as required by Grotius, let us see if we cannot dive into the secrets of the negotiation, and find there some friendly clue to guide us through the labyrinth.

It has been my good fortune to discover, sir, in the archives of the Department of State, a copy of the original protocol of conference between Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, and Don Louis de Onis, the ambassador from Spain. By reference to this, the last section but one in the ninth article, will be found the same as that subsequently transcribed in the treaty: "And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claims to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas." This, it must be remembered, is the project of a treaty furnished by Mr. Adams. Mr. Onis then proceeds thus: "To the above claim, Mr. de Onis adds, that the United States will satisfy all the just claims which the inhabitants and Spanish officers of the Floridas may have upon them in consequence of the damages they may have sustained by the operations and proceedings of the American army, as is customary with the citizens of the United States under similar circumstances." To this requisition of Don de Onis, Mr. Adams replies by the emphatic word "agreed."

This, then, contains the meaning and intention of the parties. This is the plain and unsophisticated purpose which each meant to express when this sentence was reduced into form, as it now stands in the last section of the ninth article of the treaty. Let us then examine it, and see if it can, by any possibility—by any latitude of construction—support the meaning that has been given to it.

The first thing that strikes us in this rough draught of the object of the parties, stripped as it is of all diplomatic form, and left naked and undisguised to the commonest apprehension, is this, that the word "late," so fatal to the just claims of honest sufferers, is not to be found.

The next is, that, so far from its warranting the doctrine of exclusion, or of classification, the word all is emphatically used: "The United States will satisfy all the just claims," &c. To which Mr. Adams has "agreed." Now, sir, can a purpose be plainer, or a promise be stronger? Here there cannot, even "by implication," be left "a hook to hang a doubt on." Here is a positive promise, by Mr. Adams, to satisfy "all the just claims of the inhabitants of the Floridas." Surely those of the East are as just as those of the West. I well know that, by the fashionable logic of the day, the word all would be limited to West Florida, but for the plural that embraces both "the Floridas."

"As is customary with the citizens of the United States in similar cases." That it is customary for the United States to do justice when she has done wrong, I trust that no man in this nation will be hardy enough to deny: that it is customary in cases like this, is evinced by the ready satisfaction they caused to be made to the citizens of West Florida, and by their constant protection of the followers of Matthews in East Florida; by sending an agent to Frenchtown, during our late war with Great Britain, to adjust all claims, and pay for the losses occasioned there to private individuals by the operations of our armies; and by the alacrity displayed to inflict punishment on Commodore Porter, for his recent attack on Foxardo. I know not if satisfaction has been made to Spain, and to "individual Spanish officers and inhabitants," for that affair; but I am well assured that, when demanded, it will not be denied.

But, above all, it is "customary with citizens of the United States" to make loud and reiterated demands for all injuries done by a foreign power to themselves. Witness those against Spain, now settled by the treaty of cession; against France, for spoliation on our commerce, as yet unadjusted, but the justice of which, we are told, has never been controverted; and, lastly, the claims on Great Britain, for the destruction of property during the late war, just decided in our favor by an imperial tribunal. Here, sir, are cases embracing spoliation of every character: Against Spain, for suspending the right of deposit at New Orleans, though, as in the case of Matthews, it was disavowed by the Government; for suffering French privateers to capture our shipping in her ports, and condemning the prizes in her courts of admiralty, when her independence was annihilated, and her power prostrate at the foot of France. Against France, for spoliation committed by privateers, whose acts were disavowed by the then Government, and yet must be redressed by this. Against Great Britain, for acts done flagrante bello in the operations of an invading army. And is it possible there can be a case not embraced in the examples cited? Were the acts, of which we complain in East Florida, committed in time of peace? So was the suspension of the deposit at New Orleans. Were they unavoidable by our Government? So was the capture of a vessel by French cruisers, unavoidable by Spain. Yet they are all paid for.

I had intended, in the division of this subject, to say something on the fourth head, to wit: that, if every other view of the subject, under which these people presented themselves to the consideration of the committee, should fail them, that even then they would be entitled to indemnity for the injuries they have sustained, as considered now, de novo. But, s'r, I fear that I have already wearied the attention of the committee. I shall, for this reason, rely on the ground already taken, and leave the claims of my much injured constituents to the committee and to the House, confiding, as I do, with hope and confidence, on the justice of my country to do right to those to whom they have done not only wrong, but ruin.

After some remarks from Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, and Mr. ARCHER, the question was taken, and the motion to strike out the enacting clause prevailed: Yeas 66, nays 51.

The committee then rose, and reported; and The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 12.

MATTHEW LYON'S FINE.

The bill to refund to the legal representatives of Matthew Lyon, deceased, a sum of money ($1,060 96) paid by him as a fine under the sedition law, with interest from 1799, having been yesterday reported from the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading, and the question being now on its passage—

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to lay the bill upon the table, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; and they were ordered by the House, and being taken, stood as follows: Yeas 57, nays 91.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

[Mr. LYON, of Kentucky, was, on his own request, excused from voting.]

A very animated debate now arose, which occupied the House until past three o'clock, and was then suspended by the adjournment.

Mr. DRAYTON referred to the report accompanying the bill, in which it is expressly put upon the ground that the fine to be remitted by this bill was imposed under a law that was unconstitutional, null and void, having been passed under a mistaken view of the powers delegated to Congress, and that, therefore, that it ought to be refunded, with interest. This being the avowed principle on which the bill was introduced into the House, to pass the bill would be to declare, by an act of that House, that the Supreme Court of the United States had given an unconstitutional decision, which the Legislature set aside with the same power as if they had possessed and exercised appellate jurisdiction in the case. He begged gentlemen to reflect on this before they voted for the bill. It was the great excellence of our constitution that it kept the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Departments of the Governments separate and distinct from one another. Of these, the Legislative, being the paramount branch, and possessing most power, was very properly the most guarded and fettered by cautionary provisions. But the Representatives of the people were liable to confound themselves with the people whom they represented; and, because the people possessed unlimited power, to suppose that they possessed the same. But this was far from being the case. And he asked under what grant of power from the people, express or implied, they derived the power to revise and reverse a decision of the judicial branch of the Government? If this principle was to be carried out, the Legislature would be the sole judge of the constitutionality of its own laws, and its powers and action would be without limit or control. He was not unaware that, in some of the States, the Legislature exercised a power somewhat analogous to that now to be assumed; but it never did this in its legislative capacity, but when sitting as a judicial body. The antiquity of the case made no difference in its principle: if the principle should be once established, so soon as an individual considered himself as aggrieved by any decision of the court, all he had to do was to throw a memorial into that House, (and both bodies often sat simultaneously,) and get the decision, as to its effects, at once set aside. Thus the country would be left under a Government of unlimited powers. He appealed to the House, whether they would thus confound all the departments of Government together, and overturn those institutions under which our liberty had been preserved to us. Should a bill pass involving such principles, and, on the avowed grounds of those principles, one of the most fatal stabs would be inflicted on the constitution which it had ever received; the nature of our Government would be completely changed; it would be vain any longer to talk of limiting its powers; but its pillars would be at once and forever prostrated.

Mr. DEARBORN said, that whatever his opinion might be as to the sedition law, and whatever his opinion might be on the question, whether that law had acted oppressively on the individual in the present case, he could not consent to an unconstitutional mode of relieving that individual; and as such he regarded the mode proposed by the bill before the House. To pass that bill would be to usurp not only judicial, but executive powers. The power of pardon was the only power by which a person could be relieved, who had been convicted by the courts; that power had been confided by the constitution in the President of the United States, and in him alone it existed. That power had not been exercised in the present case; and now, because it was conceived that, at the period when that law was passed, it was passed under peculiar circumstances—that it was a law oppressive and unconstitutional—would they, at the present period, bring upon themselves the opprobrium of usurping both executive and judicial power, in attempting to give redress? The sentence under which the individual had suffered, in the present case, was, at the time it was passed, in conformity with the law of the land, and in conformity with the opinion of the courts, which had their origin in the constitution of the United States. It was unnecessary for him to say what was his opinion of the sedition law. But this he could say, and without hesitation, that if he should vote for that bill, he should conceive himself to be usurping powers, which were given by the constitution of the United States to the courts and to the Executive, and to them only.

Mr. WILDE said that if he believed that such principles were involved in this bill, as had been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DRAYTON,] he should vote against it. But the sedition law had been pronounced by the ultimate and most solemn tribunal, he meant by the judgment of the people of the Union themselves, to be unconstitutional; this was superior to the judgment of any court, and to this tribunal lay the last appeal. The question now was whether Congress ought not to restore what had been taken away by an unconstitutional exercise of undelegated power? Why might it not refund this fine, as release a surety under the revenue laws, who had been declared by the sentence of a court to be liable for the act of his principal? Was this (which was done by Congress every day) to be considered as setting aside the decisions of the courts? The bill went upon the old republican principle avowed and acted upon by Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. BURGESS was unwilling to retain a dollar which rightfully pertained to another; but in this case lacked the power to act. The reconsideration of a judicial decision was clearly an act of judicial power; and if it was, it belonged to the judicial department of the Government, and to that alone. Was it for that House to legislate out of existence a decree of the Supreme Court? Could any gentleman do it in consistence with his oath as a member of that House? The House had not a scrap, not the least particle of judicial power—and how could it act judicially. He was astonished to hear reasonable men talk of an appeal from the Supreme Court to the people, and say that its decisions had been reversed at the ballot boxes. Had the people, when they delegated power to the several departments of this Government, reserved to themselves an appellate jurisdiction from the decisions of the courts? Mr. B. put the case of an individual guilty of a reasonable resistance of the laws, who should come to the President for pardon, and being refused, should instantly apply to Congress to have the sentence nullified. The House might as well do that as this. He conjured gentlemen not to transcend those holy boundaries which separated the different departments of Government from each other. Just so certainly as this bill passed, so certainly would that House arrogate to itself all those unliimited powers which, as possessed by the National Assembly, had deluged France in blood.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, (who had reported the bill,) gave a history of the previous attempts made at former sessions to get a bill of this description through Congress, and the reasons which had hitherto prevented it. He had reported the bill at the present session before he had seen the proclamation of the President; he should not have attempted such a thing afterward. The publication for which Matthew Lyon had been convicted for a libel would, at this day, be no more pronounced a libel than the celebrated forty-fifth number of the North Briton for which Mr. Wilkes had been imprisoned in London. The court paper would exhibit, any day, articles ten times more libellous. This arose from the perfect liberty of the press, which in this country, and in all free countries, constituted a sort of fourth estate, and as such possessed and exercised a vast power in the preservation of liberty. As to this bill's involving a reversal of a decision of the Supreme Court, it was no more than was continually done in reference to cases under the revenue laws. But, in point of fact, the Supreme Court never had, as such, decided that the sedition law was constitutional, (though it would have been of little consequence if they had.) The decision had been made only by some of the judges on the circuit.

The court, as an appellate tribunal, never had given such a decision. But if they had, the people of the Union had reversed the decision both of the circuit courts, the President of the United States, and both Houses of Congress; and who had dared to reverse the law since? What administration had dared to ask for such a law? As to the President alone having power to pardon Lyon, the President was the party offended; and, to send the oppressed party to his oppressor for equity, was against every principle of justice and of liberty. There was no danger of the President, because a case like this would never recur again. Would Congress insist on holding this money, when, in the case of Wilkes, the British Parliament not only reversed the decision against him, but indignantly erased the record of the transaction from their minutes? Was there less of the spirit of liberty on this side the water?

Mr. ANGEL would vote for the bill because he believed the money, to be refunded, had been extorted wrongfully. The voice of the whole American people, from one end of the country to the other, had pronounced the law unconstitutional, and it was never spoken of without reprobation. The Government was bound not only to refund the fine, but to pay smart money. He did not ask the House to reserve a decision of the Supreme Court. That court was a tribunal which the people had created, and the people had told it what it might and what it might not do. Was he to be told that the court could do no wrong? That its decision, though flatly against the constitution, was right, and must stand, and that the people, through their Representatives, could not correct the error? Should the thing created say to the creator, thou shalt not control my action? All power resided in the people, and when any of their agents did wrong they had the power to correct the wrong. If a man had been stripped of his property, and robbed of his rights, by one of their agents, had they not the power to redress the wrong? It had been said that the principles of this bill had brought Charles to the scaffold. He insisted that the people had the right to carry any Charles to this scaffold who usurped their rights. He did not wish to bring any body to the scaffold; he sought to bring a man off the scaffold who had unjustly been put on it.

Mr. CRAIG did not feel justified in voting for the bill. The argument of his honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. DRAYTON] had not been met. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ANGEL] seemed to forget that the House was no more than a creature; he spoke as if he supposed it to possess all power, and not to reflect that its powers had been restricted by its creator, and that it would as much transgress the limits of its power by transcending the powers vested in it, as could be done by the judges of the court of appeal, if they went beyond the powers vested in them. If the bill were to pass the House, it would be a precedent for annulling any other enactment which persons might choose to call unconstitutional. If, because the House found an existing law to be unconstitutional, had it, therefore, power to reverse the decisions of the courts upon that law? If it had, many persons would be at great pains to show that laws, under which they had suffered penalties, however legally, and however justly, were unconstitutional. Here was a law passed, and a person subjected to a fine under its enactment; the person who is fined, comes to the Legislature and complains that the law under which the penalty is inflicted, is unconstitutional. Congress must then determine on the constitutionality of the law before it can be decided whether the fine is to be paid or not. Could the House overthrow the decision of a court of the judiciary upon a plain enactment of law? The idea seemed absurd. If the House assumed the power to say that a law was unconstitutional, and, therefore, to relieve a penalty inflicted under that law, it acted against the very letter of the constitution. All human power was liable to abuses, and in the formation of the constitution of this country, power was placed in what are considered the safest depositories; some were given to one, some to another, and some to another, and it would be fatal to the constitution to allow that encroachments should be made by one upon the powers vested in the other. Such an encroachment would be assumption of that power to which the people only had a right. They had a right to alter the constitution; Congress had not. If the Executive, the Judiciary, or Congress, transcended the powers vested in them, let an appeal be made to the people, from whom all power emanated, and not to the legislative power, which he considered to be the most dangerous, inasmuch as it derived its power immediately from, and was next to the people. The reasons on which the present claim was grounded involved a question of law connected with the constitution, and he did not think it belonged to Congress to set the decision aside. When the sedition law was passed, it was thought to be both constitutional and expedient; now, it was thought to be unconstitutional and inexpedient; and if the Legislature were to undertake the amending of injuries which had taken place under ancient acts, then the prevalence of party would become the standard by which justice would be meted out. The party in power at one time might impose a tax which the succeeding party would have to refund. As there was no institution by man perfect, so if men attempted to put an additional guard on the depositories of power, it would be often found to be an additional mischief added to that which it was intended to guard against.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, expressed a wish to receive the indulgence of this House, in listening to him for a few minutes, on a subject which concerned persons residing in the State which he had the honor in part to represent. The only question before them was, whether they should refund a sum of money which, it must be acknowledged, had been unjustly taken from the individual whose representatives, it was conceived, were equitably entitled to it. He considered that such would be the admitted fact, and certainly no member of this House would, at this time, when it was represented that the public treasury is overflowing with money, object to the repayment of the sum of one thousand dollars, with interest, to those who had been injured by the demand and obtaining of it. In the remarks he was submitting, he wished to be understood as not raising or arguing the question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the law under which the fine upon Mr. Lyon had been imposed. He could not have risen for that purpose, for he considered that, at this period, all men, from the Rocky mountains to Boston, took pride in acknowledging that the sedition and alien laws were, to speak in the mildest terms, most unfortunate, most untoward, and most ill-timed. That it was arrayed against the just sentiments of the nation, and against all the principles of constitutional liberty. This, he observed in continuation, was now admitted by all parties, whether democratic, national republican, federalist, masons, or anti-masons. The fact was, that it was the mode adopted by the predominant party of this day to avenge itself, or to protect itself from the missiles hurled at it by the party then in opposition. The gentleman from whom the fine had been exacted, had now gone to that tenement from which no inhabitant returns—he had passed to the bourne where the weary traveller reposes in silence and in peace: but compensation he thought was justly due to those who represented him. Mr. J. went on, by characterizing the law, and the fine of Mr. Lyon, under it, as dangerous encroachments upon the liberty of the press. That liberty, he could not but confess, sometimes degenerated into licentiousness; but it was in the very nature of things that it should, unless some means, some benignant means could be devised of alluring the condition and the propensities of mankind generally. He, himself, (Mr. J.) had always thought it, and, in the result, had always found it, to be the better course to disregard the weapons which would, under a free Government, be invariably aimed at men in public life. Few persons, perhaps, had been more assailed than himself, but he had perceived the advantage of an absolute indifference to the assaults. For his own part, he could see little danger to the cause of freedom from the encroachments, if you choose to call them so, of the press. There was more danger in the exercise of the judicial power; for when the grappling irons of the judge were fixed upon a man by the sheriff, he must pay the pound of flesh rigidly exacted by the law, or go to jail; and sometimes he had to do both. Besides, the voice of the people had been decisively pronounced upon the case. The vox populi he would have considered in this House a vox Dei.

No obloquy would be thrown upon the judge who tried this case by the passage of this bill. It only provided that they should repair to the strong box, and from thence make reparation for the injury which had been inflicted. The judges had not been personally molested; no cudgels had been used; no blood drawn; no bones broken; no violence used against them. He wished to God, Mr. J. said, and repeated, he wished to God that where wrong had been done, they might have the satisfaction of afterwards peaceably doing right, without reference or resentment for any thing which might formerly have occurred as to these unfortunate events. It was his firm and decided belief, that the money paid by Mr. Lyon had been wrongfully exacted; and also that those members of the Congress of the United States who had voted for the passage of the alien and sedition laws, had voted hastily and without a proper understanding, it might be hoped of the question. He was sure, however, that if they were now in the House, and called upon to vote, they would not vote in a similar manner. His district, in the State of Kentucky, would, he was well assured, warrant and sanction the vote which he should feel it his duty to give on the present occasion. In former times, and in other countries, when the maxim prevailed that the king could do no harm, the responsible ministers of that king were liable to be carted to the guillotine or the gibbet. Those matters appertained to great national injuries. But here was a case of injustice done to an individual man; and that which was the case of one person, ought to be looked to as likely or possible to befall to every member of the community. One of the sagest maxims of antiquity, was that which declared that an injury done to one citizen ought to be regarded as an insult to the whole commonwealth. After some further remarks on this branch of his subject, Mr. J. said, they had already matters before them abounding in the sources of irritation. There were enough of bitter waters and their dregs to drink, without adding further gall to the cup. Why should they stir up the old matters of party strife, when the events of the passing hours were pregnant with the most momentous results? Sufficient (indeed, it may well be said now) to the day is the evil thereof. He briefly recapitulated his former arguments, and repeated his opinion, that, inasmuch as the people had pronounced upon the question, their decision should be considered first, and that, as he previously observed, vox populi vox Dei.

Matthew Lyon's Fine.

Mr. JENIFER said, that if he exercised his sympathies, he should vote in favor of this bill; but it appeared to him that a principle of much importance would be involved in its passage. The question was, as has been correctly stated by the member from Virginia, [Mr. CRAIG,] whether, sitting there in a legislative capacity as Representatives of the people, we were to revoke a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States? What injury had resulted from the decision complained of? The individual was fined; the penalty paid; and a diversity of opinion had existed ever since, whether his sentence was constitutional or unconstitutional. If they determined now, that it was unconstitutional, and that therefore the fine should be refunded, would they not have to act the same in all cases? Let them suppose, then, a penalty to be inflicted under the revenue laws, and that, in after times, those laws should be determined to have been unconstitutional, unequal, and oppressive, would they not have to refund in that case, and in all such cases? The case was not one of mere supposition. The revenue laws had already been pronounced so. Yes, and that by high authority—by the Executive, and by the Secretary of the Treasury. Then how could they refuse, if redress were granted to the individual in this case? how could they refuse redress to a sovereign State for injuries inflicted by laws declared, on such high authority, to be unconstitutional, unequal, and unjust? If an individual could claim redress, could they thereafter turn a deaf ear to the claims of a sovereign State? Whether the sentence had acted oppressively on the individual, or not, it had been admitted to be the decision of the sovereign court: the Supreme Court was acting in its judicial capacity. It was said the decision of the House, in this case, would involve the liberty of the press. He had no such apprehension; he believed, that whatever the decision of this case might be, the press would remain as it had been, and as he hoped it would ever be, unshackled and free. He looked upon this as one of the most dangerous measures which had been introduced into that House; he regarded it, in fact, as a nullification of the Supreme Court. He considered it as establishing the right to nullify the decisions of that court; as giving the entering wedge to future nullification of its powers. If they assented to this, they could not, thereafter, put their hands on nullification. If they thought that they, in this House, had a right to nullify, how could they deny the right to a whole section? Mr. J. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays; and, before they were taken, he should move for a call of the House, that it might be decided, not merely whether this money should be refunded, but whether that House had the power to nullify the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROOT did not intend to have taken any part in the debate, but hearing the arguments which had been advanced in opposition to the bill, calling in question the right which the House possessed of giving an affirmative vote to the measure, on the grounds of reversing the acts of a court of justice, he felt himself called upon to enter his protest against such an application of the case. When the constitution was referred to, which every gentleman in that House was bound, by oath, to support, it would be found that Congress was invested with power to pass and annul the laws of the United States, and it could scarcely be denied that it had the power to annul a sentence which had been passed under an unconstitutional law. The House had been told by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] that if the bill now before it were passed, it would sanction the nullification of the Supreme Court. The reason why he (Mr. R.) was disposed to vote for refunding the penalty was, not because he wished to interfere with courts of justice on these decrees, but because, in this case, the decision was not made under an unconstitutional law, but a usurpation by a tyrannical act, not warranted by the constitution and laws. He was not disposed to arraign the judges by whom the sentence was passed, most of whom had departed this life; but they were mad times in which they acted, and they were hurried on by the madness of the times. Public sentiment had now, however, retracted its steps; those mad times had been restored, and, therefore, he argued that the money which had been unconstitutionally extorted ought to be restored, and the fact of the unconstitutionality of the original act, gave Congress a constitutional right to pass the act now before it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] had quoted the maxim vox populi vox Dei; but if the voice of the people was the voice of God, so was the hurricane, so was the whirlwind, the voice of God, and intended for his immutable purposes. But should not the damages of the hurricane and of the whirlwind be repaired when the elements were again hushed to repose? And when the political turmoil had ceased, and the minds of the people had settled down upon the constitution, should not the damages be repaid? He would call the recollection of the House to the time when the session act was passed, and the cause of the temporary hurricane.

A few years after the constitution of the United States had been adopted, after an ardent struggle, in which it was opposed as surrendering too much power to the General Government, adopted with the recommendation of amendments, all going to restrict the exercise of constructive power, which were sent to the several States by the first Congress, and came home ratified, and became part of the constitution, they, the anti-federal party, were satisfied with the constitution, and changed their title to that of republican. Those who proudly denominated themselves the federal party, struggled to obtain the powers by construction, which were denied to them by the people and by the constitution, and endeavored to introduce amendments into the constitution which suited their policy. How did this party obtain a commanding power over the States which adhered to the constitution? These powers were claimed and made popular by identifying the opposite party, which was the old whig party, then the republicans of these States, with the revolution of France. When the ratification of the British treaty, and other causes, conspired with the French revolution to carry democracy to madness, then the nation was made mad with the phrenzy of power, and it required all the energies of the Government to put down democracy run mad, as it was in France. Many were for adopting the revolutionary views of France. Then federalism became popular; it was the lord of the ascendant, and the republican party were denominated jacobins, disorganizers, enemies to law and order, as well as to religion and good government. Whenever, in any country, any political party having the semblance of freedom, is to be put down, judges are to be found to assist the views of the dominant party. Were it not that judges were to be found capable of sanctioning tyrannic acts, tyrannic sovereigns could not execute their purposes. Men would not be oppressed by tyranny, were not the judges to yield to the propensities of their sore-reigns. In England, under the old tory dynasty, when the proper cant of the day was employed in chaunting the divine right of kings, passive obedience to the powers that be, and non-resistance, the duty of yielding absolute and submissive assent to power, was highly popular for a time. But principles could not be carried into power without proper instruments; and judges, worthy of respect in other particulars, had prostituted themselves before the current of the times. Jefferies was said to have been a good judge in other cases, but, as an instrument in the hands of the crown, he became odious in the estimation of all who advocated the right of the subjects against the oppressions of the crown. After the revolution of 1688, the confiscations and fines which had been occasioned by political offences under the Stuarts, were restored.

Mr. R. continued, by asking whether the British Parliament had not, after the revolution of 1688, made reparation for some of the damages which had occurred from the oppressive measures that had taken place under the tyrannical dynasty of the Stuarts? At the period of our own civil revolution, public sentiment had returned to its proper channel. Throughout the wide extent of this confederated republic, there would be found few, except those disposed to do honor to the memory of the principles of departed federalism, who would contend that the sedition law was constitutional. There was no evidence necessary to show its unconstitutionality. That law, and its first cousin, the alien law, had been, by the political revolution of 1801, pronounced, as facts could speak, in terms as strong as human language could furnish, as strong as any language that could be used in judicial decisions, to be unconstitutional and void. The voice of the people had made itself heard on that occasion; it was a voice of thunder, proclaiming in words that could not be misunderstood, that one great paramount authority existed, which had a legitimate control over the power that would, in its unconstitutional exercise, bear down the States, and with them the very palladium, theegis of our freedom. The people of the United States ought to show, at the present day, that they had neither forgotten nor forsaken the principles for which their fathers were distinguished, and the fruits of which were to be seen by reverting to the mighty revolutions of 1793, 1799, and 1800. If the doctrines of that day were not now to be advocated, might it not be ascribed to the fear which persons professed to entertain of nullification--of that nullification which he would not say had been set up as a bugbear, but as a barrier over which they were forbidden to leap. And what, said Mr. R., is this nullification, a word which flows with so much fluency from so many lips? What is it but the assertion that this House, or any other legal body, has a right to hold that to be null and void, and of non-effect, which is in itself a nullity? If it be not null in itself, it could not be made a nullity. But when a measure was carried into effect, which possessed none of the substance of constitutionality, that measure involved an unwarranted assumption of power, and, wanting all the attributes of law and justice, was, he repeated, in itself, a nullity; and as such, Mr. R. contended at some length, was the sedition law.

The judges, he maintained, were not the supreme arbiters of the constitutionality of their own decisions. It was a monstrous doctrine to assert, that they must necessarily be the judges of the extent of their own powers and jurisdiction; and if it should be admitted, away (said Mr. R.) with all public liberty. Your judges, after all, are but men, and all men love power; and what power will not men exercise, if it can be exercised without control or responsibility? Give judges this power, and even when attended by the solemn mockery of a trial by impeachment, when exceeding their powers, the very essence of tyranny would be displayed, and the judges would be possessed of supreme power over the lives and liberties of the people. If they were the judges of the extent of their own jurisdiction, then they could extend that jurisdiction at their own pleasure, without control, or without constraint or limit. After some further remarks, Mr. R. observed, that if it was true that this money had been unconstitutionally extorted from Mr. Lyon, it ought to be refunded. The call was as imperative as that to restore stolen goods. The ill-gotten pelf ought to be given back--whether it could be considered impugning the judges on this case, their first duty was to do justice, without regard to consequences. "Fiat justitia, ruat cælum."

Mr. BARRINGER said he regretted to see this bill again before the House. It was an old acquaintance; he had heard all the arguments upon it, both for and against, before that day. He might, perhaps, know the reason why it was once more introduced at the present time. "Coming events," it was said, "throw their shadows before them." He recollected a measure similar to this in 1827, in which a gentleman, who now figured largely in the political world, took part. The motive to introduce this bill was stronger now. He was astonished, he had almost said alarmed, when he saw the result of the vote of that morning, to lay the bill on the table; for, on former occasions, it had not stood the test of scrutiny. He was, then, utterly amazed, on the present occasion, to see individuals, who before, would not give it house room, voting to sustain it before the House, and thus to bring the subject again before the country; for what purpose he would not name. The bill implied that it was to effect an act of justice, by refunding money to an individual which had been unjustly and oppressively taken from him. Now, the term refunding, implied that the individual had paid the money. He (Mr. B.) believed it came to him on authority somewhat stronger than tradition, that the individual, in this case, had not paid a single copper; no, not even a doit; although it was now asked of the House to refund 1,000 dollars with interest from 1799. He believed it was pretty generally known and acknowledged, that the intention was not to oppress the individual, but, through him, to aim a blow at the democratic party. That party had so considered it, for they paid the money; the individual fined did not pay one cent. Would it be said, then, that it was necessary to justice, to pass an act to give back to a man what had never been taken from him? Perhaps it would be said, that this act was necessary to vindicate the memory of the individual. But was it so? No, his memory was vindicated in 1801; it was vindicated by the public voice of the country; it was vindicated by Thomas Jefferson, and those who acted with him; they thought it was fully vindicated; if they had not so thought, they would have gone to the full length of the tether, to have completed its vindication. What did Jefferson do? He released every man that had been imprisoned under the sedition law; he did so on the ground that that law was unconstitutional; avowing, both in public and private, his right to do so, on that ground. He did not examine into the merits of individual cases, but released them all in the gross. Then was the memory of the individual, in this case, amply vindicated; aye, it was more than vindicated. Instead of being held up as an object of scorn, he was exalted to the public gaze as an object of applause, of admiration, of envy; he was looked upon as a man who had suffered, not for crime, but for the public good; a man who had suffered in the cause of public liberty. He (Mr. B.) should think the memory of this man more nobly vindicated then, than it could be by pouring into his coffers a thousand dollars more than had been taken away from him. Mr. B. said, he regretted that he had been urged to say a word on this subject; but, when he knew that the vote he should give upon this, might subject him to unjust imputation, he felt it necessary to say a few words in explanation of the grounds on which he should vote. If it was thought necessary that the House should, at that time, express its opinion as to the sedition law, that object might have been obtained in a more decided way than by this bill, which, in fact, would not express the opinion of the House on that point at all. He was as much of opinion that the sedition law was unconstitutional; that it was a direct attack on the liberties of the press, as any gentleman on that floor; but we did not take the character of that law into consideration, when voting on this proposition to refund 1,000 dollars, with interest from 1779, to an individual from whom it had not been taken; and to reverse the decision of the courts. Others might vote for or against the bill on the ground of its expediency or its in expediency. For his own part he considered the House had not the right to examine into a case, for the purpose of reversing the decision of the courts. Who had delegated such a right to them? Had the people? Certainly not. It was repeatedly affirmed as the basis of action, that they were judges of the facts? But who had made them judges? Certainly not the people who sent them there. He, for one, then, should vote against the bill without expressing, so far as that vote was concerned, any opinion as to the constitutionality or the unconstitutionality of the sedition law.

But might there not be some other object sought, than the mere refunding of 1,000 dollars in the passage of the bill at this time? He must believe there was a stronger motive operating now than on former occasions. He could not suppose that this Congress was more sensitive to the claims of justice than any former Congress; than the Congress of 1819, '20, or '21; or than the Congress of 1801, which brought in the compatriots of Thomas Jefferson, who had the power to redress the wrongs of this individual, if they had thought redress called for. He must believe, that something stronger than a mere motive of justice, was operating now. What could that motive be? and what the object sought? These were difficult times. They were frequently told that a crisis is at hand. In 1806 and 1807 the shadows of coming events were, indeed, foreseen. The shadows are here, said Mr. B., overshadowing whole provinces. Could it be, then, that this was introduced to favor a particular doctrine, published in one section of this country? Was a conspicuous document issued on the 11th day of the last month, to be flouted by this measure? Was an indirect blow to be aimed at it, by the passage of this bill? He did not believe that justice required this money to be refunded. He did not believe that the House had power to refund it; nor did he believe that the present crisis would justify the passage of the bill, in affirmance of a particular doctrine. If this, however, was the desire of gentlemen, why did they not come out openly, and put every man to his voir dire, to say either for or against? and not put the issue on a question, by which a man's opinion must be judged by mere implication. It might be right, it might be just, to cast obloquy on the judiciary; on that branch of it, which, whatever might be the opinion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOR] as to the tyranny of judicial bodies, was that arm under which, at last, the freedom of the country must take shelter. He would deprecate, then, the mercy of the gentleman towards that body, which had been assailed from all quarters; whose very existence seemed to depend on the breath in their nostrils, but which, said Mr. B., when it falls, must bring in its ruins, both the liberties of that gentleman and mine. When the judicial power could not afford them shelter and protection, they must either seek it under the shade of a thorn, or within the iron arms of a military despotism. Let them now, by a legislative act, give sanction to the assailants of that branch of the judiciary, and he apprehended that consequences might follow, as to which he could only say, God forbid they should ever overtake the country. Mr. B. said he had intended to ask the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] how he had suffered this matter to sleep for six and twenty years? How it was he had so long neglected to claim redress for one who was his esteemed colleague? How he could so long have permitted this crying sin of injustice to cry unheeded?

Mr. JOHNSON asked leave to explain. He was not in that House; he had been in the Senate ten years, and there he had spoken in behalf of the claim. He was not the associate of the individual concerned. Mr. J. denied being influenced by any party purposes on the present occasion; his only wish was to do justice to one who, he conceived, had been wronged.

Mr. BARRINGER resumed, and after a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JOHNSON] concluded by saying, that his only object in rising was to vindicate the vote he should give, and to prevent any wrong impression being drawn therefrom. In doing this, he had represented the case in the light in which he saw it. He hoped the bill would not pass.

Mr. DANIEL regretted that the bill under consideration, "which cast its shadows ahead," should so obscure in mystifications the just conception of the gentleman who last addressed the House, [Mr. BARRINGER], as to alarm his imagination with ghosts and hobgoblins. The argument he urged against the passage of this bill, is of a most extraordinary character. He commenced by telling the House, as early as 1826 this subject was named to him by a distinguished gentleman, and, forsooth, perhaps, nevertheless, there was some secret, hidden political motive, in bringing it forward. Who the distinguished gentleman was that named the subject to him, and what the supposed motive could be that prompted the measure, he leaves hidden in a pile of rubbish, to find which, Mr. D. said he would as soon undertake the task of looking for a needle in a haystack. It was due to the honorable gentleman, however, to say, that after he had soared aloft in the regions of unbridled fancy, he descended to particulars; but in making the admission, he was constrained to acknowledge that he did not comprehend his meaning, even when he seemed to aim at perspicuity. He supposed this bill, which was reported at the last session of Congress, had not reached in the calendar till this, was intended as a thrust at a certain paper. To what paper does the gentleman allude? Is it some kite which has been flying in the air? or does he mean the late extraordinary proclamation of the President? If he does, in reply, Mr. D. said, he must be permitted to declare he never anticipated, at the time the bill was reported, that such a paper would have ever emanated from the source which it did. For it was a high toned federal paper, containing all the ultra federal doctrines heretofore deprecated by the republicans of the country.

The impeachment, by dark hints of motive, is rendered harmless when the history of the case is recollected. For twelve or fifteen years, in some shape or other, this case has been pending before Congress. It is now about to receive the favorable consideration of this honorable body, to prevent which, at this late hour, the honorable gentleman to whom allusion has been made, in addition to the discovery which he has made as to the motives which are urging it forward, has received information from some person not named, and for the truth of which he will not vouch, that the fine was not paid by the late Matthew Lyon, but was paid by the republican party. This, Mr. D. said, in his judgment, would not change the principle. The receipt for the fine was, however, given to Colonel Lyon, and was amongst the papers which would outweigh the vague information of an unknown person. He was one of the committee who reported the bill, and the information which he had received was, that the fine was paid by the petitioner, of which fact he did not doubt.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Those attempts to parry the force of the merits of the question, by such puny considerations, will fail before an enlightened community. The question is one of importance, and should be fairly met. It is admitted, with one exception, [Mr. BURGESS,] by all who have spoken in opposition to this bill, that the sedition law under which the fine was imposed, was an unconstitutional law. The reasoning employed to avoid the conclusion to which such admission must necessarily lead, is a novelty amidst the many strange occurrences of the day. The money is extorted by an unauthorized act, a violation of the constitution. The individual who has been robbed and plundered by the Government, presents himself before that Government, and demands the restoration of his money. The Government, whose duty it is to protect its citizens in all their constitutional rights, admit the fact. Those who have charge of the administration of the Government have taken an oath to support the constitution. This constitution has been violated in the outrage committed. It is now submitted, to determine whether we will do an act of justice to an individual who has been wronged out of his estate, by which we heal a breach made in the constitution, which we have taken a solemn oath to support. Notwithstanding the oath which the gentleman has taken to sustain the constitution, and notwithstanding his admission that the law was an infraction of that instrument, still he will not give relief, because a circuit judge violated the constitution in imposing the fine. This is his argument, which, too, is intended as a compliment to the judge. The argument is not very consistent; and he was sure the court would not thank him for it, if, in the course of his remarks, he had not manifested a spirit of adulation to that tribunal, which, in some measure, would make atonement.

Let us examine the argument, and see how it stands. We are told that the liberty of the citizens depends on sustaining the decision of the court in the case of Matthew Lyon; it is admitted that that opinion violated the constitution, and that he was imprisoned accordingly. The conclusion from the premises is, to sustain the liberty of the citizens, the constitution must be violated, and the citizens imprisoned. From such crude notions to sustain liberty, Mr. D. said he dissented to the very core. It seems to be a source of alarm that a large majority of the House is about to sustain the bill, thereby giving a manifestation of their devotion to liberty, rather than the court who gave the decision. The republican constituents of the honorable member would, he had no doubt, look into the matter, and decide it according to the constitution, without regard to the opinion of the court. The American people have long since put their seal of condemnation on the sedition law. He viewed the vote now to be given, as an approval or condemnation of that law. It could be viewed in no other light.

The efforts which are made to cast a shade over the subject, by the honorable member from North Carolina, Mr. D. said, reminded him of a roguish horse, (not that he would compare him to such an animal,) when he breaks into a neighbor's cornfield; every ear of corn he bites he throws up his head to look out for the owner, and a gap through which he can make his escape, should he be assailed. The opposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CHASE] was most extraordinary. He well recollected, when the Buffalo road bill was under consideration, and which road passed through his district, he supported it on the grounds that, as the money was in the treasury, Congress had a right to appropriate it to any object, constitutional or unconstitutional. He now thinks it would be unconstitutional to appropriate money to be refunded to an individual from whom it was taken by a law which is acknowledged to be unconstitutional; and as the money is in the treasury, he was in hopes the gentleman would stick to his old ground.

Mr. BARRINGER replied to Mr. DANIEL. He had not stated from his own personal knowledge the fact that the fine was paid, not by Mr. Lyon, but by the party to which he belonged. It was within his (Mr. B.'s) remembrance that such a statement had been made in that House, and, on asking a gentleman who was a member of it, he had been informed that he had never heard of its being denied or contradicted. If he understood rightly, the receipt for the payment of the sum, by whomsoever paid, must necessarily be in the name of Matthew Lyon; but this, he should think, could not be construed into a disproof of the allegation. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DANIEL,] he should not enter into an encounter of wits with him. There were some persons, to use the words of an eminent poet, whose wits are sharper than their swords. As to his (Mr. B.'s) conduct in that House, and to the approbation or disapprobation of his constituents, these were questions to be settled solely with them. He had acted at least with consistency, and whatever was the humble estimation at which his talents could be rated, he was not politically inferior as the Representative of his fellow-citizens, to any gentleman within the hearing of his voice.

Mr. DANIEL briefly rejoined, and observed that, as to the remark of responsibility being due, he had asked the gentleman from North Carolina for none. But he could not understand the mystification in which his argument, if argument it could be called, was wrapped. The gentleman had said that his statement of the payment of the fine by the party to which Mr. Lyon was attached, was not made on his own authority, and yet contended that the allegation had not been disproved. What could the allegation against the correctness of his (Mr. D.'s) statement mean?

Mr. BARRINGER: I made no allegation against you.

Mr. DANIEL resumed, and, after a few further remarks, observed that, in his opinion, the money was as justly due to the representatives of Matthew Lyon, as if the house of that gentleman had been broken open, and rifled of the sum, for the purpose of transferring it to the coffers of the treasury.

Mr. BURGESS rose, but yielded to a motion for adjournment.

MONDAY, JANUARY 14.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the discussion of the Tariff bill.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, of Connecticut, rose. He said that when the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had introduced this bill into the House, he had accompanied it with a few remarks of a general character, all of which were very pertinent and proper; but, since that time, the committee had not been favored with the views of any one gentleman, from any part of the country, in favor of the bill; and, if a judgment was to be formed from what had taken place, thus far, there was reason to apprehend that neither they nor the country were to be favored with any new light, or any new facts, or considerations, on which the House was pressed to pass so very extraordinary and wholly unexpected a measure.

He regretted this the more, the more he looked into the bill, and reflected on the principles it contained, and the consequences likely to follow it. Congress had never legislated on a measure which, if adopted, would tell more in our future history. He repeated it, that such a bill should have been introduced, and an attempt made to force it through the House, without one word being said by those who were in favor of its passage, was most unexpected indeed. So soon as this bill should have passed

The Tariff Bill.

both Houses of Congress, and received the Executive signature, millions of property which had been invested in establishments that had grown up under the sanction, and on the good faith of the Government—property, not of the “sumptuous manufacturer” merely, (as he is called in the South,) but of the working, laborious, common people; the laboring community would be deprived of its value, and all the thousands, yes, the millions of these laborious citizens, would find their condition in one moment greatly changed. The rich would become poor, and the poor idle and wretched. Thus far they had lived under a Government of some degree of uniformity, and had calculated, as they had reason to calculate, that that uniformity would, to a certain extent, be preserved; but now they would, in one moment, find its policy reversed, and themselves reduced to the utmost distress. He had been told by gentlemen out of the House, he had not heard it from any in the House, that the people of the South were looking with anxiety for this bill. He did not doubt such was the fact. But gentlemen ought not to forget that it was not the South alone, but the entire population of his portion of the country, who were looking to the fate of the bill with the most intense anxiety; and he did not hesitate to declare there, in his place, that if this bill should ever become a law, it would prove the winding-sheet of New England.

Standing there to speak the language of his constituents, the first remark he should make upon the measure proposed, was, that it was exceedingly premature and hasty. He asked gentlemen who pressed a bill like this, whether the bill itself had yet so much as reached all their constituents? They must answer, no. A bill lowering duties of itself six millions, and going into operation within forty days, and, together with the reductions made by the tariff act of the last session, proposing to reduce the revenue at one blow, from twenty-five millions of dollars to twelve millions and a half; a bill of such momentous consequence to every portion of the country; a bill containing principles which subverted the entire policy of the country, was pressed to its passage, in sullen silence, before it had even been seen and examined by one-half of the American people. When that bill should have reached them, what did gentlemen suppose would be their answer? He would make his appeal to the Representatives of that great State which had taken the lead in the school of protective policy: has Pennsylvania said the tariff needs to be revised? Let her Representatives speak, if it be so. And he asked, what had been heard from the “empire State,” as it had justly been denominated? Had any voice come from New York indicative that the country desired such a measure as this? Had any voice been heard from New England? Not a breath had reached that House declaring such was the people’s will. A deep and universal alarm was beginning to pervade New England; nor would the voice of approbation come, wait ever so long. He feared lest one portion of the American people, who had been forced into their present pursuits by the votes of the South, and who had ever since been led on from step to step, from tariff to tariff, by that House, when they learned the measure that was preparing for them, would look upon their fields and their factories with sorrow, and learn to hate a Government so fickle and so faithless. He feared that, should this bill pass into a law, the consequence would be, not only distress and heart-burnings, but, in the end, a settled hatred to the Government; a hatred far beyond any thing that had been felt in the South.

Mr. E. hoped the Committee of Ways and Means would pardon him, if he asked them another question. It was but a few weeks since that House, after calling in to its aid all the information it could obtain, whether from the intelligence of its own members, or through the official organs of the Government, had passed a bill remodelling, and greatly reducing the tariff of duties. He would ask the committee what new facts, what fresh light, what heretofore unthought of reasons had led to a proposal so entirely and widely different from that which had so recently been adopted? He could conceive of none, unless it were the discontents prevailing at the South. If gentlemen would accompany him to the committee room, where this bill had been prepared, he did not believe they would find a single memorial praying for such a measure, or a single fact which the House had not had in its possession four months ago. On what principle had the House acted only so long ago as July last? How often had the yeas and nays been called on propositions for raising or lowering duties, by one, two, or three per cent.? And how was it that honorable members of that House, who had then, after so much discussion, concluded to diminish the revenue but six millions, were now, all on a sudden, willing to diminish it twelve millions? Had they acted on light before? If they had, where was their new light now? Surely they must have been in utter delusion four months since, or how could they vote for such a bill at present?

The honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, in the few remarks with which he had introduced the bill, had stated two considerations as the grounds on which it had been brought forward. One was, the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government; and the other was the permanent establishment of a protective tariff. Mr. E. would not add any thing to the able replies which had already been given to the argument of the chairman, as well by his colleagues as by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on his right; [Mr. CRAWFORD:] but he could not pass the subject without a single remark, viz: that it was matter of great doubt, in the view of minds of much intelligence, whether the proposed removal of protecting duties would be followed by any reduction of the revenue at all. He did not say that it would not, but he felt a strong doubt.

The reduction of duties on foreign merchandise would not necessarily reduce the amount received, but might, like destroying the dykes in Holland, be followed with inundation.

But in reference to the other point, what did the gentleman mean? Did he aim at a reduction of the burdens on the people? If that was his meaning, Mr. E. was prepared to take issue with him. The gentleman had neither theory nor facts to support any such position. He knew, indeed, that the people of the South believed that such would be the result. They thought that free trade would relieve them from all their distresses. But it was Mr. E.’s firm belief that they would be able neither to buy nor to sell on any better terms, were the tariff annihilated entirely. The greater part of the people’s burdens would not be in the least relieved. Mr. E., however, would not follow gentlemen who had already discussed this point with so much clearness.

He had intended to say something upon the inequalities and partialities of the bill, but others had fully exposed these, its defects. The committee, in their report, say that the duties will average from ten to twenty per cent. See, then: twenty-nine per cent. on tea, from twenty-eight to ninety-three on iron, forty-seven on coal, thirty-nine on salt, fifty on cordage, sixty-four on spirits, forty-six on sugar, twenty-eight on molasses, and only twenty on cottons, twenty on woollens, and fifteen on wool. He did not complain that any of these duties were too high, but that they did not do equal justice, especially to wool, woollens, and cottons. He believed that adequate protection, such as makes uniform the market, excited competition, induced investments, and the efforts of genius and perseverance. It was a wholesome barrier against the inundations of the overgrown capital and pauper labor, as well as the selfish and shifting legislation of European nations. Let our countrymen feel secure, and they will do in manufactures what can be done any where. Thus, since 1816, the era of the protective policy, every manufacture has been falling in price, and improving in quality, so much so that cotton fabrics, which then cost twenty-five cents, could now be purchased for eight cents.

Mr. E. addressed himself chiefly to the friends of the protecting tariff. He was not speaking to such as disbelieved its constitutionality—they felt themselves bound to vote against the whole system. He was addressing those who believed that a majority of the House and the nation held a protective tariff to be both constitutional and expedient; and he put to them the question how they could possibly vote for such a bill. For,

In the first place, the bill involved an entire change in the policy of the country. Mr. E. had looked into the bill, and had found it to contain principles utterly hostile to the entire policy which had hitherto governed this nation. As such, the bill was hailed with gladness by the people of the South. He had heard Southern gentlemen say, that the principles of the bill constituted the dearest part of it. They openly declared that, hereafter, there was no longer to be such a thing as a protective tariff. Now, if a majority of Congress were willing and prepared to abandon the whole system of protection, no doubt it could be done. He did not, however, for himself, as yet, believe any such thing. But it was not to be denied that the bill went that whole length.

Mr. E. always listened with most profound regard to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It was due to the station he occupied. When the President's message had been reading at the commencement of the present session, the moment the Clerk came to that part of the document which had reference to the tariff, he believed there was no gentleman in the House who entertained any doubt, that it was the desire and determination of the President that there should be a change in the great principles of our policy. Mr. E. asserted that the President of the United States had openly declared, that the true policy to be pursued by this country, was to renounce its protecting tariff. He had listened, however, to such a declaration as but the first note of alarm. The message had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the next step had been the introduction of such a bill as was now before the committee—a bill which proposed, as one of its striking features, the raising of one million of revenue from articles not protected, viz: from tea and coffee—a mark not less decisive than that on the forehead of Cain. Where had that principle come from? Had it originated with the manufacturing States? With the friends of a protecting tariff? Or had it come from a previous principle, viz: the equalizing of taxation for the purpose of revenue only? And was it any thing but the first step towards a system of general taxation, without any regard whatever to the protecting principle? Doubtless it was, and had been so intended to be. All were laboring to relieve the country, and, at the same time, protect its industry, by leaving the taxes on protected articles only. Yet here was a proposition to draw one-twelfth of the whole amount of revenue from articles which needed no protection. Would not the nation say that such a bill was, in its principle, hostile to the protective system?

But there was another proof of this still more decisive. Mr. E. had looked into the bill, with a view to discover what provision it contained for the protection of manufactures of iron, wood, leather, paper, cotton, and wool. And he put it to gentlemen to say, whether any provision had been made for these objects. And yet, what strife and contest had they not witnessed on that floor but a few months ago in the effort to place the duty one per cent. or two per cent. higher or lower. The committee had now, at a stride, gone from field to field, from region to region, in reduction, and had not stood above one, two, or ten per cent. Yet, now when such a sweeping bill as this was brought into the House, its advocates had not a single fact to lay before the House in its favor. Were they to legislate in the dark? Were they now to condemn the very act they had performed but a few months ago? Were they to brand themselves with censure for what themselves had done? How were such matters managed in the British Parliament? They appointed a commission, through whom they obtained the fullest and most exact information from the best informed individuals in the country; and the results were printed, and laid on the tables of the members.

No Government was worth preserving unless it acted upon intelligence. But what had been done in the present case? Had the Committee of Ways and Means called a single manufacturer before them? Not one. They had no confidence in the manufacturers. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDuffrie] in a speech of his at the last session, had heaped upon them epithets such as Mr. E. would not repeat. In his own part of the Union the people had great confidence in the integrity of their character. But perhaps the gentleman knew more of them than they did. The committee, at all events, had consulted none of them. Had they gone for their facts to intelligent merchants? He believed not. What light had broken in upon them, or what light had they communicated to the House? For himself he remained quite in the dark. And, in the mean while, he heard an awful rumbling under ground, and the echoes seemed to say, that the precipitancy, the haste, which marked this whole proceeding, boded to the manufacturing interest nothing less than destruction, root and branch. Had the House any right to pass such a bill? Was it for any such purpose they had been clothed by their constituents with the power they exercise? Were they at liberty thus to trifle with the great interests of the country? He was speaking to the friends of the protecting tariff; and he put the question to their conscience and their understanding.

But he would now proceed to that which, after all, was the real cause of this bill. He meant the discontents in the South. He hoped that his honorable friend, [Mr. McDuffrie,] for such he esteemed him, who so ably represented the views of the South, would not charge him with any disrespect. But, might he not say, that if any member of the House should be asked out of the House what was the cause which had produced such a bill, would he not say, the discontents in South Carolina? No man, woman or child, could doubt the fact.

In relation to this matter, the first question he should ask was this: Were they not bound, in endeavoring to relieve the people from the burden of taxation, to see that they did not merely change the scene of the discontent? It was known to all, that during the late war, very deep discontent had existed in one quarter of the Union, in relation to the General Government. He had the authority of a gentleman from Georgia, for saying, that the country was near revolution. But let the House, while it was endeavoring to appease his friends at the South, be cautious that they did not, as he had said, merely change the scene. He thought there was no just cause for demanding from the North so great a sacrifice. The first question asked of him by his constituents would be, will South Carolina be any better off when the tariff is annihilated? He feared he should not be able to give an answer such as should be satisfactory to the people of South Carolina. It was very important that the people of the North should be convinced that there existed some real grievance, for the removal of which they were called on to make so great a sacrifice. Nothing else would ever induce them to forego the advantages they now enjoyed.

It was, he believed, almost unanimously admitted in all parts of the Union, except only in the Southern States, that the theory of their oppressions was a false theory, viz: that the burden of taxation fell wholly upon the producer or importer, and not the consumer. The President, in his message, and in another paper of his recently put forth, had expressly declared that the South Carolina theory was not a true and sound one. Could that House, by passing the present bill, make the North believe that it was? How many gentlemen in that House believed that it was a true theory? Very few. How many in the other House believed it? Very few. Ask all the people of the Union north of that spot, or even ask the people of the South themselves, and they would tell them that it was false. Now, if such was the opinion held by all the branches of the Government, and by the people themselves, how could they call upon the people of the Northern and Middle States to make a sacrifice of all their vital interests in favor of a theory which all declared to be founded in error? It was a thing that never could be done. But he was not going to enter on that subject. All he should say was, that he assumed the Southern theory to be false; and, so holding, he affirmed it to be no proper ground on which to demand such a sacrifice as the bill proposed; and should the Northern and Eastern States be compelled to submit to it, they would be taught to hate the Government, and reproach her for her perfidy as long as they lived.

But Mr. E. went farther. He asked the friends of the tariff what they believed to be the true theory? They would all reply that the true theory was that which the President had, in so lucid and satisfactory a manner, demonstrated in his last proclamation, viz: that the duty, in all cases, ultimately fell upon the consumer. If that was the sentiment of the friends of the tariff in that House, then he asked them, when the complaints of the South were urged as the great argument in favor of this bill, how their constituents ever could be reconciled to it? The climate of the Northern States, as well as the habits and character of the people, would prove where the burden of taxes on consumption was most felt, if it existed at all. They, of the Eastern States, inhabited a rough, cold, and comparatively sterile country, where winter reigned for seven months of the year. Did not such a population stand in need of warm clothing more than the people in the South? Did they not want flannels, and blankets, and cloths, and stockings? All which would be brought from Great Britain. What was the difference between the laboring classes of the North and the South? Just the difference that existed between a family of free men with their sons and daughters about them at the family board, and the comfortless cabin of the slave. Where was the great theatre of consumption? In the North, or in the South? He was willing to hazard his reputation on the fact that the great mass of consumption lay north of this city. He believed that the 2,000,000 of people in the State of New York consumed more of foreign importations than 5,000,000 in the slave States. The climate, and all the habits of the people were, of themselves, sufficient to show this: and yet would the South say that they were oppressed by the consequences of consumption? They could not say it. If the House was about to change the policy of the nation, they must first make the people of the North feel and understand the grounds on which they proceeded. The doctrine of consumption paying taxation was all in favor of the North, and against the South; and this doctrine he fully believed to be the only true doctrine.

There was another consideration which induced him to oppose this bill. A portion of our income consisted of receipts from the Post Office: these receipts amounted to not less than $2,500,000. Whence was this collected? He did not complain that they, of the North, paid more than their just proportion; but it was certain that more than two-thirds of this was collected north of the Potomac. Let them look at the money, the $3,000,000 received every year from the sale of the public lands. Where did that come from? His constituents knew something about the new lands of the West. The youth of New England were constantly going forth to people the wilderness. Peace go with them. He expressed no regret, but mentioned the fact as it existed. New England had not, during the last ten years, gained as much as the single State of Indiana. There had been one perpetual drain from her population. What proportion of all the money received from public lands into the treasury came from the North? More than two-thirds of it. He knew some of the most intelligent and enterprising men in his part of the Union, who had removed into the West, carrying with them capitals of thirty and forty thousand dollars. He appealed to gentlemen from the West to say whence the money in their part of the Union came? They would all reply, from the Northern States. The customs, the post office, and the public lands, constituted the three great sources of support to the treasury. All these were drawn mainly from the Northern States; and, under such a state of things, he appealed to gentlemen from the South to say how they could ask their Northern brethren to come around the great family altar of this Union, and there offer up their vital interests in sacrifice. The people of the North could not understand it. They could not be made to see or feel its necessity.

He would now, in a short review of our past legislation, justify the attachment of his constituents to the protective policy, and show the South why they are determined to adhere to it.

The people of New England entertained old fashion notions, as to the power given by the constitution to the General Government, to regulate foreign commerce. Soon after the settlement of these colonies, their inhabitants manifested a strong disposition to introduce manufactures. That disposition was beheld by the mother country with great jealousy. As an example of which it would be sufficient to state, that a law was passed by the Parliament of Great Britain, declaring that founderies in the colonies were a nuisance, and as such, in so many words, directing their destruction. And, in fact, it was this feeling which had ultimately led to our own revolution. Soon after our independence was accomplished, it was found to be the policy of England to prostrate domestic manufactures in this country. Massachusetts, New York, aye, and old Virginia, too, had all attempted the establishment of manufactures, and had all failed; they had all failed from want of a power in the General Government to regulate commerce. New York had her own system of duties, Rhode Island had hers, and each port had its own tariff. Under these circumstances, good old Virginia, in 1786, had proposed a convention of the States at Annapolis for the very purpose of regulating commerce, and of providing a protection for domestic industry. And the deliberations of that body had resulted in calling the convention at Philadelphia, which formed the Federal constitution. And what did they find in the constitution? Mr. E. could not pass over this, because it furnished an ample justification of the attachment of the North to the protective policy.

The constitution gave absolute, unqualified power to Congress to "regulate foreign commerce." This was just what all had wanted; and, accordingly, the very second statute passed by the new Government was an act laying taxes for the double purpose of revenue and protection. All hailed the passage of this law with joy. At the fourth Congress an act of registry was passed, which gave a similar protection to American shipping; next came the tonnage duty; and then the act securing to our own citizens the exclusive possession of the coasting trade; and last in the train, came the law giving bounties on the fisheries. There was one provision in the first protecting law worthy of notice, viz: that which laid a duty of three cents per pound on cotton. What was that for? For revenue? For that could not be, for there was no raw cotton brought into the country. Every statesman south of the Potomac had voted to impose that duty, and thereby exercised that very power which was now declared by all the South to be in utter violation of the constitution.

Mr. E. went on to say, that after the successive tariffs of 1816, 1818, 1824, 1828, and 1832, his own State, as well as all New England, had considered the question of the protective policy of this country as fully established, and finally settled. But when that principle had first been breached in the days of Mr. Jefferson, they were not only not in its favor, but almost ready to rise in arms against it. In 1807 the people of the Eastern States had been, universally, a commercial people. The doctrine of protecting manufactures had come from Thomas Jefferson in the first instance, and had been warmly responded to by all the States south of the Potomac. "Perish commerce!" was the cry. "Let us be independent of Great Britain." Very different had been the feeling at the North; there the commercial population had seen nothing but starvation and ruin before them. They did not, indeed, rise in actual rebellion; but there existed but one feeling on the subject, and that a feeling of the most decided hostility. But the doctrine had been finally established. It had been established by Southern votes; and the people of New England were, in consequence, driven from their ships, and the theatre of their industry changed from the ocean to the land.

He appealed to gentlemen from the South to say whether, in 1816, the South had not been opposed by the North in this now reprobated policy? Whose voices had been heard in Congress in favor of the doctrine of protection to our own industry? The voice of Lowndes—the voice of Calhoun above all others. It sounded as a death-note in the ears of the North; but the party in power forced the doctrine upon her. "Perish commerce!" was the motto on the Southern banner. But what now? The doctrine, this Southern doctrine, was now an abomination; and the Eastern States were called to the altar to make a burnt sacrifice of their invested capital and all their hopes of prosperity. Sir, it cannot be done; it will not be done. And here Mr. E. asked leave to read to the House the remarks of an honorable gentleman from Georgia, now in his eye, and the efficient mover on this occasion, [Mr. WILKES,] in reference to this very subject. They were as candid as they were just, as beautiful as they were true. He read from an answer returned by the gentleman to a letter addressed to him by a committee of his constituents, in September last, dated in Virginia, and designed as a circular:

"Writing within view of Monticello, once the home, and now the grave of Jefferson, I may not profane the air I breathe with the language of submission. Neither must I bear false witness against my neighbor, for his name reminds me, that some five and twenty years ago the patriarch of American freedom, assisted by Southern politicians, laid, in the exclusion of all commerce with foreign nations, the foundation of protection to domestic manufactures. "We must bring our workshops from Europe!" "We must not consume the productions of those who injure and insult us." "Perish commerce! Let our constitution live!" Such was the language which, for years, found an echo in every Southern bosom, from the Potomac to the Mississippi. Such was the feeling that bore us through embargo, non-intercourse, non-importation, war. Need I tell you, gentlemen, that it was Southern votes which, in 1816, carried a tariff partly for revenue, partly protective, against the strenuous opposition of the navigating interest? And must I protest, even to you, that this recapitulation is not made to defend or accuse the past or the present—to inculpate or exculpate any man or party, or people, but simply because it is the truth. "The thorns we reap are of the tree we planted;" they may not wound us the less; but surely we have no right to impute all the injury to others; I do not say we ought to bear them patiently, or at all. I will not presume to tell a whole commonwealth what it can or cannot bear; but I will recall to the recollection of my countrymen, even at the risk of some odium to myself, that the manufacturing States were made such by our legislation. We destroyed their shipping, and they turned to manufactures. Must we destroy their manufactures that they may return to their shipping?

"It is natural enough that we should seek to remove restrictions which are hurtful to our industry; but it is equally natural they should strive to retain what they imagine beneficial to theirs.

"Considering when, by whom, and under what circumstances they were imposed, it is asking too much of human nature to expect they will be readily abandoned. A part of the population on which they were forced, once spoke of seceding from the Union if they were persisted in. But the Union has survived their discontent. They converted our folly to their benefit; and now we meditate secession unless they will instantly relinquish their advantage."

He would commend this paper to the magnanimity of the honorable gentleman himself. The people of the Northern States had not forgotten whence the tariff came; they had not yet forgotten that it was Georgia and South Carolina, and all her Southern sisters, which had led New England into the position she now occupied, and the Southern gentlemen must own it to be true.

Mr. E. said he had risen mainly with a view to vindicate those who had sent him here, from the most unjust and unmerited insinuations. Every characteristic of odious tyranny had been, by Southern gentlemen, applied to the industrious mechanics of the North. They were told, again and again, that, from a love of gain, they were trampling upon the constitution; that if they were even within its letter, still they were doing violence to its spirit and manifest intent. This was not true; and, in order to show that it was not, he had gone into this history of the origin of the protecting policy. He feared that he had consumed too much of the time of the committee in doing so. But as the system had originated with Virginia herself, he felt it due to his constituents to vindicate them from a slander for their present attachments.

The gentlemen of the South, however, continued to urge the charge, that, in the tariff laws the North was palpably violating and trampling upon the constitution. Now, he wanted to look this position in the face. He wanted to see where truth actually lay, and while he endeavored to discover it, he hoped the Southern gentlemen would accord him a due respect to them personally, and to their constituents.

He averred that they, of the North, were not trampling upon the constitution. Nothing was further from the purpose or the feelings of those whom he represented. The constitution was dear to them; they held, and ever should hold, its provisions sacred and inviolable.

The power they were exercising in enacting a protective system of policy, was the power "to regulate foreign commerce." Did gentlemen from the South find no such clause in the constitution? There it stood; could they erase it? "Congress shall have power to regulate foreign commerce." As to the exercise of this power, where was the limit? Did the constitution fix any? But it was said that the constitution was violated, because the duties were so laid as to operate a protection to domestic manufactures. But where was the clause declaring that commerce should be regulated for revenue only? The power was to be exercised on all the principles on which a similar power was exercised by the British Parliament, and in all the Governments of Europe, for the general benefit of the common country as a whole. Let it be made out that a certain exercise of this power will further the general prosperity, and the exercise of it was perfectly constitutional; and it was the duty of Congress to exercise it. If they believed that the protecting policy was calculated to benefit their country, were they to be told that they must not exercise it? Would friends of the tariff say to their constituents, Here is the power, and its exercise is for the good of the country, but we must not use it, because there are dangers at the South? Such an argument was neither honorable nor satisfactory. The constitution gave the power—the power had never been exercised to this end—and it was now too late to say that the exercise of it is not constitutional.

If this power of protection could not rightfully be exercised by Congress, where was it? What had become of it? The States had not got it: was it then lost? Nothing was farther from the truth. Congress might lawfully regulate commerce in whatsoever way would most promote the good of the country. This very point constituted the chief excellence of the constitution, in the view of the people of the North. They inhabited a hard, sterile, and inhospitable country. They had been driven from the ocean; and if there was no such power in existence for the protection of their home industry, the constitution had lost its prime excellence and virtue in their eyes. He prayed gentlemen to allow the people of the North still to look upon the constitution as they had done, with confidence and affection.

Need he say that it had been the uniform contemporaneous understanding of the constitution, that Congress should regulate foreign commerce to the ends of protection? The Union came into being under the existence of this power. Every nation in Europe had exercised the same, and had exercised it for their own exclusive benefit—and were now doing it. Why should not this country enjoy and wield the same power? and why not use it for her own protection?

But the protective tariff was complained of as an exercise of partial and local legislation. What was meant by such a charge? Did gentlemen mean that Congress had no power to pass any law that should not, in its operation, be equal and universal? He should like to know whether the embargo law, the non-intercourse law, the non-importation law, had been equal and universal in their practical bearings on this country?

He would ask of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAR] whether the laws enabling his constituents to give up poor land, and exchange it for better land, was not local in its operation? whether they were passed for the interest of the North and the East? Were the fortification laws equal in their operation? A nation was made up of individuals; and while a law might be for the general good, it was to be regretted that some individuals might, at the same time, be injured, or at least might not share in the benefit. But let the gentlemen look at the subject in a somewhat larger view. We were a nation at least in some respects. How could that be called local legislation which was confessedly for the general good? They, of the Eastern States, had, at the time, thought the non-importation law very hard in its operation: but it was said the country demanded it. And he denied that the present law was local. The people did not feel it to be so in his part of the country. For the same reason, there was no foundation for the assertion that the tariff was an interference with the domestic concerns of the States. In the regulation of commerce we are a nation, and if the people are affected, it is as parts of the whole—and this is right. Would gentlemen deny that Congress had power to counteract the injurious legislation of foreign nations? And what was that legislation? Out of thirteen millions of inhabitants in this country, the products of nine millions were virtually excluded from all foreign ports. Under such circumstances, would it be wise or just to take all the manufactures our people needed from England, while we were forbidden to carry our bread stuffs to them? Would any gentleman maintain such a proposition seriously? The notion of free trade was one of the most visionary that ever entered the mind of man. It was fair, indeed, upon paper; but when attempted to be applied to the actual affairs of men, it proved so unequal that the nations of the earth never could, and never would, carry it into practice. The doctrine of protection, on the other hand, was, in its nature, and has been proved in effect to be, calculated to raise us to an equality with other nations. What, in fact, could this country do without it? This nation emerged from its colonial bondage, and came into being under the existence of that principle. All the powers of Europe were enforcing the principle wherever it was in their power. There would be a revolution in England in six months, should it even be attempted to repeal the system. Let her ports be open to the products of our lands, and how long would her agricultural interests be sustained? She could not pay the interest of her debt, nor uphold her system of tithes and sinecures a day. We then must enter into the same system, or must be content to place ourselves under the feet of all foreign nations.

But it had been urged in opposition to the tariff laws, that the imposing of such a law was an act of tyranny exercised by the majority over the minority; and the accusation had been so often repeated that the phrase had, in some degree, lost the harshness with which it had once grated upon his ear. But what did gentlemen mean by language of that kind? What propriety was there in making such a charge? The power was clearly given in the constitution, and it was the Southern States that had called upon Congress to exercise it. He wished gentlemen would only look into the constitution. That instrument left them an appeal to a neutral power; to an independent, disinterested tribunal; and what was that? It was the United States Supreme Court—a court no more appointed by Congress than the States. The President nominated, and the Senate approved, while we could only institute an impeachment. And did this make them our servants, or had it actually corrupted them? They were emphatically the country's judges, and had ever proved themselves equal to their responsibilities. He knew very well that there were gentlemen in that House who would laugh at such a declaration, and would reply that the court was nothing more than a tool in our own hands. But the court was not their tool, nor the tool of any body living. The North had no more control over it than the South. It was a constituent part of this Government, and whether this Government was only a confederation of the States, or whether it was something higher still, an appeal was open on the part of any State to the decision of the judicial bench. Such was the theory of our Government. It was not like the old confederation. That consisted but of a single body. But here was the beautiful theory of the Government which had succeeded it. First, a legislative body endowed with certain enumerated powers; then a judicial tribunal to decide when those powers had been transcended; and then an executive, to carry its acts into effect. And if gentlemen from the South told him that that court did not possess sufficient intelligence or weight of character to decide such a question, he should tell them in return, that that was a point which the North would never compromise. The spirit of the constitution required Congress to exercise the power to regulate foreign commerce in such a manner as should best promote the good of the country at large. Mr. E. was astonished to hear gentlemen indulge in such remarks, accusing the Government with tyranny and oppression, merely because it proceeded in its ancient course, and exercised a power which was written on every page of its charter. There was one view in which the present discussion was of great importance. How far did gentlemen intend to run out the principles of this bill? and where was the principle to stop?

It was apprehended by the people of the North that, if the Government should give its sanction to a bill like this, especially the one now in question, then they are to look forward to a total abandonment of the protective policy. It would not be long before the registry act would follow. The next step would be the repeal of the tonnage duties, and then would go the coasting trade and the fisheries. The principle of the bill went to the abolition of all these acts, because they all created a preference in favor of one over another. South Carolina insisted that no preference must be given. There must be no inequality. Every law must bear on all alike; and, before long, they would hear her voice which now cried down with protection, and let us buy where we can get the cheapest, cry down with the coasting trade, and let us hire vessels wherever we can get them on the best terms. He repeated the warning. All these acts were based on the principle which was now struck at. Sanction that principle, and how long would it be before they would be required to abandon even incidental protection? For what was incidental protection? Nothing but an unequal tax for protection. Might it not be said by those opposed to incidental protection, that Government had no right to lay a tax of a hundred per cent. on one article, and none upon the other? What could furnish a finer topic for complaint than that one class of merchants should be allowed to bring in their goods free of duty, while another class was required to pay one hundred per cent. on theirs? Was not this unequal taxation? And why were such taxes laid? It was on the principle of preference, of protection only, though it is called incidental protection. If they were now to begin with putting a tax upon tea and coffee, how long, he again asked, would it be before the whole protective system would be given up?

South Carolina had declared that there should be an equality of duties. How, then, was one article to pay one hundred per cent., and another nothing? It was clear they must give up incidental protection along with direct. He hoped Pennsylvania would take the lead in this dance. As for Louisiana, she seemed to have a bribe held out to her of two cents a pound on sugar.

Mr. E. said he had seen but one letter from the North on the subject of this bill, the writer of which considered it as the best bill that had ever been brought before Congress, because it was a bill that never could be passed. If it could be, then let Congress take off all protection, and let all the interests of domestic industry fall into ruins together. This, no doubt, Congress had power to do; but he warned gentlemen, if they did it, that a voice would be heard that would full soon compel them to retrace their steps, and enter again the path which had been marked out by Lowndes and Calhoun.

Mr. E. could not discover how it was that the people of the South could possibly believe that such a bill as this would relieve their burdens; but, supposing that it would, and supposing that their complaints were well founded, he asked gentlemen, in the last place, was this the time to pass such a bill?

The President, in a paper lately put forth by him, had declared it to be his judgment that this was not the time.

Mr. E. asserted that such was the ground taken by the Chief Magistrate. He had declared to South Carolina that honorable men could not legislate under such circumstances. That State had assumed an attitude which drew all eyes upon her. She had raised the banner of open opposition to the constitution and the laws; and if prints received in town that morning, spoke the truth, she was at that moment gathering an army under that banner, for the avowed object of resisting the legislative functions of the Government. She had declared that she was no longer subject to the authority of this House, and the only terms on which she would return to her allegiance, were terms of unqualified concession on the part of the General Government, and an immediate dereliction of the policy of the country.

Mr. E. then asked whether wise men, acting under high responsibility—whether decided and fearless legislators were prepared to do what they were thus commanded? He called upon gentlemen to take care—yes, to take care what it was they did at such a period of their country's history. Their offended sister had done that which she could never efface. She had broached doctrines which the people of the United States denied, and which he must be pardoned for adding, they detested. South Carolina had done more to weaken the ties which cemented this Government, and which bound the people of these States to each other, than all others beside. He warned gentlemen to beware how they once began to yield to demands of this nature. The Government must put down these excitements, or they would put down the Government. What the result of such a state of things would be, was known only to that Power before whom the future was as the past. For himself he could only say that he should not shrink from the performance of his duty, and that he never would consent to legislate under a menace.

Was this the time to yield? He trusted not. It would be to raise a monument higher than the pyramids of Egypt, to the doctrines and precedents of nullification. A few great names might be inscribed upon it; but let him tell the members from South Carolina, that how high soever their monument might be raised, it would be built of the bones of the laboring class of this community, and under it would be buried the laws and the constitution.

Mr. BRIGGS of Massachusetts, next addressed the committee. I need not say to you, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. B.) that the State of Massachusetts is deeply interested in the tariff. The people of the district which I have the honor to represent, have a capital of more than two millions of dollars dependent, in a great measure, upon the fate of the bill on your table. I shall vote against the bill, and the facts already named constitute my apology for throwing myself upon the indulgence of the committee, long enough to state my reasons for that vote.

Sir, at the last session of this Congress, a law was passed upon this identical subject, after a protracted and full discussion. It was carried by an unusually large majority of both Houses of Congress, and received the prompt sanction of the Executive. It was passed as a measure of peace and conciliation. That law had not yet taken effect, and its operation upon the revenue, or upon the great interests of the country, can only be known by experiment. It is certain, however, that under it, a large amount of revenue will be reduced, and it may produce a very sensible effect upon some of the manufacturing interests. The most strenuous opposers of the tariff, at the last session, professed a willingness to reduce the revenue by a cautious and gradual process, so as not suddenly to ruin the manufactures. Where now is the necessity of departing from that principle of action, by demolishing the law then passed, before its effects can be known? It would be an unheard of course of legislation, in this or any other country, for the same men to repeal a law upon a subject which involved the vital interests of the country, and which they had passed upon the most careful and deliberate consideration, before it should have gone into operation, and when the circumstances of the country had undergone no change demanding a precipitate repeal or alteration. After so much time had been spent at the last session, and a bill passed upon the avowed principle of compromise and concession, the people did not expect that the question would be again agitated at this session, before they could see and understand the bearing and effect of the law then passed.

The Tariff Bill.

The committee who recommend this measure, urge, as a reason for its adoption, that the revenue must be reduced to the wants of the Government. I readily concede this point. I trust all will admit, that after the national debt shall have been paid off, the amount of revenue to be raised must be limited to the sum required to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, and to meet such authorized constitutional expenditures, as shall be necessary "to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare" of the nation. But, sir, the precise amount which would be required for these objects, and the particular sources from which it should be raised, are grave and important questions, which, under the present condition of the country, demand grave and deliberate investigation.

If the entire revenue is to be raised from import duties alone, justice requires that it should be drawn in equal proportions from the people of the different States, and the different sections of the country. But how shall this be done? It by no means follows, that an equal rate of duty upon all the imported articles, would produce this result. It may happen that the same number of people in one State, from their habits, business, or climate, consume a much larger amount of imported articles, than the same number of people in other States, and thus made to contribute more than their just proportion of the public revenue.

On the contrary, it might be found upon full and careful examination, that a duty upon a comparatively few articles of importation, would, by reason of the generality of their use in all parts of the country, afford the necessary revenue, and make a just and equal distribution of taxes among the people of the several States. If a system could be devised, by which a sufficient amount could be raised by a fair and equitable distribution of the duties to be paid, and, at the same time, preserve and sustain the great and varied interests of the country, I am not able to discover what reasonable objection could be interposed against its adoption. Though the practical operation of such a system might be more beneficial to one portion of the country than to another, yet if it operated no injury to that other portion, and was uniform and impartial in the contributions which it would draw from every part, it would be just, and ought to be satisfactory. To enable us to carry these principles into operation, it is important to know, as near as may be, what amount of imported dutiable articles are consumed in the different States of this Union. In the final adjustment of the tariff to the revenue standard, this essential information cannot be dispensed with without the hazard of doing great injustice somewhere. This knowledge, so indispensable to right action upon the subject under discussion, it is not within our reach, and cannot be during the present session. Our treasury is now empty; the national debt is not yet extinguished; the amount of revenue which may be required for the current, and the coming year, cannot be precisely ascertained; and as the officer in the financial department of the Government does not call for an immediate reduction of the duties, the passage of the bill, at the present session, would seem to me to be an act of precipitant and hazardous legislation. The committee present their plan as a permanent revenue measure. This consideration heightens the importance of mature deliberation before we settle down upon it.

Mr. Chairman: The bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, if I am not widely mistaken in its character, does not contain those just and equitable principles so essential to such a bill. It professes to go back to the tariff of 1816, yet it considerably increases the duty from those of that act, upon some articles of domestic manufacture, and so far reduces others, as to threaten with utter ruin the branches of industry engaged in their production. Under this bill the duty on some kinds of iron are much higher than those of 1816, whilst the average duty on wollens are lower than that of that year.

The duty on cotton manufactures are placed far, very far, below those of 1816. Whilst it withdraws the protection of the Government from the great interests of the New England States, it so arranges the duties by which the revenue is to be raised, that the people of those States must pay greatly beyond their just proportion of the public taxes.

From the habits, climate, pursuits, and population of New England, it is demonstrably clear that they must consume a much larger amount of the heavy articles of importation, according to their numbers, than the same amount of population in the Southern States. Among the articles which are in universal use, and which enter into the consumption of all the people of those States, may be named sugar, molasses, cloths of all kinds, and especially wollens, of and above, the medium prices; tea, coffee, and iron; the latter heavy and costly article is not only extensively used for agricultural purposes, but is used in vast quantities for machinery and ship building. So average and regulate your duties as that their great interests, embracing not only their manufacturing, but their agricultural population, shall not be sacrificed, and they be compelled, by a sense of injustice, to disrespect a Government which has, in a thousand different forms, promised protection to their industry, and they will continue to pay, what they are persuaded they have long paid, more than their equal proportion of the public revenue, though they firmly believe that every part and section of the country is benefited by the protective policy.

Mr. Chairman: The bill on your table, under the form of a simple revenue measure, proposes to change the great policy of this Government. Is this policy one which has suddenly started into life? Is it, as has frequently been alleged upon this floor, the creation of a tyrannical and reckless majority, impelled to action by motives of selfish sordidness, regardless of the interests, and trampling upon the rights, of the minority? No, sir, it claims a higher origin, a nobler purpose.

The policy of developing and bringing forth the rich, and exhaustless resources of our extended country, by fostering and protecting domestic manufactures, has engaged the anxious and continued attention of this Government from the adoption of the constitution. This position is maintained by a reference to the course of legislation, the reports from the Treasury Department, and the uniform tenor of Executive messages from the time of Washington to the present day. And, sir, I shall be much disappointed if it does not turn out, upon examination, that it has been the favorite scheme of the great leading statesmen of the South.

I will not consume the time of the committee by talking about the second act of this Government, passed on the 20th July, 1789, the very preamble of which declares it necessary to lay duties "for the encouragement and protection of manufactures."

In his last message delivered to Congress, in December, 1796, President Washington says: "Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures." "The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in any way which shall appear eligible."

In relation to the same object, President Jefferson, in his closing message, communicated in November, 1808, has the following remarks: "The situation into which we have been thus forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties, and prohibitions, become permanent!" Protecting duties and prohibitions! Yes, Mr. Chairman, in 1808, Mr. Jefferson, the President of the United States, the great republican leader, the strict and able expounder of the constitution, the highest authority of political orthodoxy, of the present day, in one quarter of this Union, could officially speak of rendering manufactures permanent by protecting duties and prohibitions, without lighting the torch of civil discord, or shaking the integrity of the Union. But now, sir, the name of this great man is relied upon by those who profess to be his true followers, to show that laws which create protecting duties, "are plain, palpable, and dangerous violations of the constitution," and that the States which oppose them, have a right, if not to nullify, to recede from the Union, if they are not repealed.

The Tariff Bill.

Great efforts were made by the leading republicans of that day, to give popularity to the plan of building up domestic manufactures. The prominent newspapers of Virginia, and of the South, led the van, and urged on their followers in the patriotic service. The committee will recollect the numerous extracts to show the sentiments of Southern men on this subject, read from a volume of the Richmond Enquirer, taken from the library of Mr. Jefferson, by the honorable gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] in the course of his very able and eloquent speech at the last session of this Congress. The sentiments, toasts, and resolutions at public dinners, and fourth of July celebrations, clearly show what, in those days, was the current of public opinion. It was in 1808 that Mr. Jefferson, in a letter addressed to his friend Thomas Leiper, Esq., of Philadelphia, in strong terms, spoke of building up domestic manufactures, as the "true republican policy." He said it was the design and policy of "New England federalists" to continue a commercial people, and thus keep up a dependence on foreign nations for a supply of manufactured articles. With an adroitness peculiar to himself, he sought to identify the opposition to his favorite system, with the opposition to the party of which he was the head. New England was then suffering under the restrictive system of the General Government, which bore upon her with peculiar weight and severity. Her people were necessarily and essentially a commercial and navigating people. They were then the stout advocates of those free trade principles, which the national legislation afterwards compelled them to give up, and which are now proclaimed to be so essential to national prosperity in a region, where then, the domestic policy was declared to be the sure foundation of public prosperity and permanent independence. Sir, impartial history has recorded all these matters, and they will stand out on the future page as subjects of curious speculation to those who shall come after us.

In his first message of May, 1809, Mr. Madison speaks thus on this subject: "It will be worthy at the time of their just and provident care, to make such further alterations in the laws, as will more effectually protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted and established by the laudable exertions of our citizens." The same distinguished President, in his message of February, 1815, says: "But there is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress, than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence, and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States, during the period of European wars." "This source of national independence and wealth, I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress."

In the message of December, of the same year, he says: "In adjusting the duties on imports, to the object of revenue, the influence of the tariff on manufactures, will necessarily present itself for consideration. However the theory may be, which leaves to the sagacity and interest of individuals, the application of their industry and resources, there are in this, as in other cases, exceptions to the general rule."

"It will be an additional recommendation to particular manufactures, when the materials of them are extensively drawn from our agriculture, and consequently impart and insure to that great fund of national prosperity and independence, an encouragement which cannot fail to be rewarded."

The extracts which I have read are taken from Executive communications made prior to the tariff of 1816, and show most clearly the opinions and views of their authors upon this absorbing topic. No time need be taken up in speaking of the situation of the country at the time the tariff law of 1816 was discussed and passed. We had just come out of a war of alternate disaster and honor, during which the Government had experienced embarrassments of the most perplexing nature. The talented and patriotic statesmen who had stood by the country through the hardest struggles of that conflict, remembered, with humiliation and regret, the destitute condition of the country during that gloomy period. The American soldiers in the camp, and in the field, were clad in foreign cloths, and wrapped in blankets manufactured by their enemy, or shivered in the storm destitute of necessary clothing and covering.

On the return of peace, floods of foreign merchandise and manufactures poured in upon us, and swept away many of our infant establishments, and threatened with inundation and utter destruction all those monuments of skill and ingenuity and enterprise which had been erected during the few preceding years. The highest motives of patriotism, and the strictest demands of justice, called on the Government to adopt some system of measures which should screen existing institutions from final overthrow, and guard the country against the recurrence of those evils which it had so recently experienced. To accomplish these objects, the tariff of that year was carefully and laboriously adjusted. The policy of permanent protection to domestic manufactures was proclaimed and established by that bill, as the settled policy of the Government. The men who advocated and carried it through Congress placed it on that ground. Mr. Lowndes, the gifted son of South Carolina, and one of the brightest ornaments of his country, and "over whose ashes the best tears of America have since been shed," was at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means who reported the bill. He stood by it, through every stage of its progress, and defended its details and its principles until it triumphantly passed the House. Mr. Chairman, some of the ablest speeches which has ever been published in this country, in defence of the policy of a nation building up domestic manufactures, as a means of wealth and independence, was made on the occasion to which I have alluded, by another distinguished citizen of South Carolina, in the hall where we are deliberating. Well did my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. ELLSWORTH] remark, that, in the debate on the tariff, the voice of Calhoun was heard above all other voices. Sir, the enlarged, bold, and statesmanlike views which he then took of the subject, as a great public policy, and the arguments which he urged to convince others of the soundness of those views, will remain as monuments of the depth and perspicuity of his intellect, when he, with the generation to which he belongs, shall have passed away. "In regard to the question, how far manufactures ought to be fostered," said he, "it is the duty of the country, as a means of defence, to encourage the domestic industry of the country, more especially that part of it which provides the necessary materials of clothing and defence." "Manufactures produce an interest strictly American, as much so as agriculture." "Again, it is calculated to bind together more closely our widely spread republic." "It will greatly increase our mutual dependence and intercourse, and will, as a necessary consequence, excite an increased attention to internal improvements, a subject every way so intimately connected with the ultimate attainment of national strength, and the perfection of our political institutions." "That a certain encouragement should be extended at least to our cotton and woollen manufactures." "If," said he, "it should be asked why, with so many advantages, the necessity of protection? It is to put them beyond the reach of contingency."

Mr. Chairman: During the progress of that bill, an honorable member from the State which you represent, now in the other branch of the National Legislature, [Mr. FOSTER,] proposed to lay a duty of five cents a pound on brown sugar, and gave as a reason, that if Congress would give proper encouragement, that article could be made in Georgia to a very great extent. Both of the gentlemen named, from South Carolina, supported the proposition. Whatever changes may have been wrought by political vicissitudes, or the transforming influence of party spirit, the men who sustained the principles of that law, and carried it through the Legislature, were then the cherished and honored statesmen of the United States. Until the journals of Congress shall be destroyed, its authority will be sustained by the names of Lowndes and Calhoun, from South Carolina; and the names of P. P. Barbour and Pleasants, from Virginia, with other distinguished names from both these States, whose votes stand recorded in favor of its passage. It was about the time of the passage of that law that Mr. Jefferson wrote the famous letter to his old personal and political friend, the venerable Benjamin Austin, of Boston, upon this important subject. Mr. Austin had informed him that his political opponents had quoted his former opinions on the subject of domestic manufactures, to support their own opinions in opposition to the protective policy. In reply, Mr. Jefferson gave the reason for the change of opinion which had taken place in his mind, on that subject, a long time previous to the date of that letter, and declared his entire devotion to the existing system. He said the time had come when "we must place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to a dependence on a foreign nation, or be clothed in skins, and to live, like wild beasts, in dens and caverns. I am proud to say that I am not one of these. Experience has now taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as our comfort." He complained of the injustice done him by those who referred to his opinions long since exploded, to sustain their opposition to measures which he considered essential to the independence and comfort of the people of this country. The people of New England, and especially of Massachusetts, who had mourned over their ruined commerce, and seen their ships decay and rot at their grass-grown wharves, through the long and gloomy period of the embargo, non-intercourse, and war, when the war had ended, hoped once more to return to their favorite pursuits, and repair their broken fortunes; but they were again destined to feel the bitterness of disappointment. Unwilling to give up their ships, and abandon those pursuits in which they had been reared, the people in that section of country interposed a strong and vigorous opposition to the passage of the tariff of 1816. The Representative from Boston endeavored to get exempted from the severe operation of that law, cargoes of East India goods which had been ordered by the merchants of that city without any knowledge or apprehension that such a law would be passed. He was told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the manufactures wanted immediate protection, and the desired relief was denied. In spite of New England remonstrances, and New England votes, the bill passed by the influence of Southern statesmen, and Southern votes, united with the votes of the Middle and the Western States. We are now soon to know, Mr. Chairman, whether this system, in which New England is so vitally interested, against her remonstrance, is to be overthrown by a combination of Southern votes with the votes of the Western and Middle States. New England yielded to the law, and turned her ingenuity, her industry, and her capital, into those channels, opened by national legislation, into which capital was invited to flow, to build up a policy deemed of the first importance, and to the support of which the public faith was solemnly pledged.

Mr. Chairman: Unfortunately for the country, the opinions of distinguished individuals who advocated with signal ability, the law of which I have been speaking, have, since the time of its passage, undergone a radical change. What was then maintained as a wise and necessary public policy, independent of its effects upon individuals or classes of men, is now declared to be a system of oppression and injustice. Even the constitutional right of protecting the industry of the country is denied. Sir, I do not reproach those men whose opinions have been thus changed, however deeply the consequences are to be regretted. Mutation belongs to man. We are taught by inspiration itself, "that learned men are not always wise." But if opinions change, principles never do. Great principles which form the permanent basis upon which things rest; upon which depend the prosperity of human institutions, and the happiness of society, never can be shaken; they are permanent as the hills, perpetual as the mountains.

Sir, the transactions of which I have spoken, are all written down, and the muse of history which overlooks this hall, waits to record the result of our deliberations upon this long agitated and deeply interesting subject.

In the expose of the policy which he intended to pursue, contained in his inaugural speech, delivered on the 4th of March, 1817, President Monroe said: "Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government." His message of December, in the same year, has the following sentiment: "Our manufactures will require the continued attention of Congress." In December, 1819, he says: "It is deemed of great importance to give encouragement to our domestic manufactures." The message of December, 1822, from the same Chief Magistrate, declares "that there are strong reasons, applicable to our situation and relations with other countries, which impose on us the obligation to cherish and maintain our manufactories." In his last message to Congress, Mr. Monroe declared that "his opinions on the subject of the tariff remained unchanged," and earnestly recommended it to the attention and consideration of Congress.

In speaking on this topic, the present Chief Magistrate, in his message communicated in December, 1830, says: "In this conclusion I am confirmed, as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended this right under the constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people."

All these Presidents were Southern men, belonging to that section of country which now stands in hostile array against that uniform system of policy so long and so ardently recommended by their own distinguished public men, and so constantly sustained by every branch of the Government.

The Tariff.

Sir, I assumed that the protective policy had been the cherished policy of this Government since the adoption of the constitution, and that it had been sustained by the leading politicians and statesmen of the South. I appeal with confidence, and ask, have I not maintained my position? Shall it now be suddenly and rashly abandoned?

Mr. Chairman: Under the course of legislation which it has been shown the nation has steadily pursued, the citizens of this country, reposing confidence in the oft repeated pledges of the Government to sustain the national industry, have, from time to time, invested large amounts of capital in the various branches of domestic manufactures. Great numbers of the laboring population of the country are dependent upon mechanical and manufacturing pursuits for the means of subsistence; and the prosperity of entire States rests upon the continuance of the protective system. The capital involved in the growth and manufacture of wool in the United States, amounts to one hundred and sixty-four millions of dollars. The annual produce of this branch of industry alone, is forty millions of dollars. Three-fourths of this amount is the produce of agriculture. In truth, sir, this great interest is, more properly speaking, agricultural than manufacturing. Its sheep is valued at forty millions. Great as this interest is, it is the weakest point of the American system, and one against which the combined efforts of domestic opposition and foreign competition are concentrated, with a power that threatens to overwhelm it. Yet, sir, by the bill on your table, the duty on the middling and finer qualities of cloths is put at twenty per cent., and that on the coarser kinds, used exclusively by the Southern States, at five per cent.; reducing the average far below that of the tariff of 1816. The duty on wool is fixed at fifteen per cent. Whilst wool and woollens are thus thrown open and exposed, the duty on iron ranges from twenty to ninety-three per cent. This hall has often rung with severe and bitter invective against the monopolising manufacturer, and justice has been demanded for the labor of the agriculturist. But now the first fatal thrust is made at the great farming interests of the Western, Middle, and Eastern States. By this bill, the duty on tobacco of ten cents a pound, equal to thirty-three per cent., is retained. Since the year 1790, the duty on this article has been nearly or quite up to the point of prohibition. The chairman of the committee has not seen fit to explain to us why this product of Southern agriculture is still entitled to this discriminating favor of the law. I should be glad to learn from some of the able Representatives from Virginia, how it has happened that this important staple of that venerable commonwealth has been the object of high protecting duties from 1790 down to the present time. I do not name this as a subject of complaint.

The capital employed in the manufacture of cotton is 45,000,000 dollars, and it produces an annual value of 32,400,000 dollars. This branch of manufactures constantly employs 62,000 persons. It works up yearly about 80,000,000 pounds of cotton, exclusively the production of our Southern plantations. The fabric wrought from this great staple of the South is in universal use among all classes of the population of the Northern and Eastern States. The household manufacture from flax and wool has almost entirely given place to this cheap and valuable article. The duty on imported cotton cloths is fixed by the bill under discussion, at twenty per cent. By the operation of the minimum principle in the tariff of 1816, the duty on a yard of imported cotton cloth, costing in the foreign market eight cents, was six cents and a quarter. By the present bill it is about one cent and a half per yard.

The committee have also seen fit to impose a duty of twenty-nine per cent. on tea, nine per cent. more than the nominal amount of that upon the two articles of manufactures that I have mentioned, which are so essential to the comfort and independence of the country. The laborious farmer and mechanic and manufacturer, whilst he sees himself and his interests abandoned by the national legislation, is made to pay a duty upon an article of daily and necessary consumption, one-third greater than that which is imposed upon the foreign articles which come in competition with his own industry. Is this equality? Is this, sir, the boasted justice of the bill designed to calm the public discontent? The amount of capital employed in these two branches, added to that embarked in the manufacture of iron, of glass, of paper, of sugar, of salt, and of numerous other establishments scattered all over our country, certainly presents an aggregate of sufficient magnitude to claim the consideration of the American Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, what has been the effect of the protective system upon the prosperity of this country? If any one doubts its beneficial influence upon the great and diversified interests of the widely extended people, let him compare the situation of the country since the tariff of 1824, when a practical efficiency was given to the principle, with its drooping, struggling, embarrassed condition for the same number of years preceding that period, and his doubts will be solved. At the opening of the present session of Congress, the Chief Magistrate, with great truth and propriety, congratulated the country upon the signal prosperity which pervaded every part of the Union. The Executive messages communicated to the various State Legislatures carry with them the same evidence of the civil, social, and political blessings diffused among the citizens of this great republic. The eye of the Creator never beheld a people in any age of the world, or on any part of the globe, who enjoyed, in such rich profusion, the means of happiness, and who had at their command so many resources of individual enjoyments, and of national prosperity, as the present population of the United States. Are these rich blessings the fruits of a wise or an unwise public policy?

Mr. Chairman. Has it been seen in nature, that the flowers of spring bud and blossom, and beautify the earth under the influence of perpetual frosts? Is the earth green and verdant, and does it yield to the husbandman a plentiful harvest, where the poisonous simoom blows its withering blasts? And, sir, will it be contended that, under the operation of unwise, improvident, and oppressive laws, the people of any country, no matter what may have been their natural advantages, ever advanced rapidly in population and in wealth, and in all the arts and improvements that adorn and embellish private life, and add dignity and consequence to national character. Such an assumption would set at defiance every principle of political economy, and call in question the truth of all history. Why, then, is a policy under which the country has reached an unrivalled prosperity, to be rashly assailed and destroyed? Are we growing impatient under too much good fortune? Has great success made us restless and eager for a change? Let us take counsel of experience, and learn wisdom from the past, before we take a step which we may not be able to retrace.

We are again told that the public debt will soon be extinguished, and that the revenue must be reduced to the wants of the Government. Again this is admitted; but, sir, we say that this may be done so as to spare the protecting duties, leave uninjured the great interests, and do justice to every part of the country. Sir, the industrious, high-minded people, whom I have the honor to represent on this floor, though they cling to the protective system "as the sheet-anchor of their hope," are too just to be willing to prosper at the expense of their fellow-citizens in any other portion of this Union. They do not ask that high taxes should be kept up for their benefit. But when the total extinguishment of the national debt shall render it necessary to reduce the annual revenue many millions of dollars, they ask, and permit me to add, sir, they have a right to demand, that it shall be so done as not to involve them in ruin, if, by sparing them, no injury or injustice shall be done to the rights and interests of other parts of the country. They have the fullest confidence that all these desirable objects are attainable. To accomplish them is a work of care and great deliberation.

H. or R.]

The Committee of Ways and Means inform us that one section of the country complain of unequal burdens. Have they so cautiously and fully examined into the ground of these complaints in all their bearings, as to be able to pronounce upon their justice? They have not attempted to show what will be the probable operation of the bill they have reported upon the various interests of the country. And although they have treated the subject as a simple financial one, they have not shown what proportions of the amount which they propose to raise will be paid by the people of the several States. To frame a mere revenue bill intended to be permanent, should not this knowledge, so far as it is attainable, be in the possession of the Legislature? The adoption of the resolutions, offered a few days since by the gentleman from Rhode Island, would bring before this House, and the nation, a mass of useful facts and information upon this important subject.

A majority of this House, at their last session, after much discussion, in a spirit of compromise, fixed a rate of protecting duties, at what they then believed to be the lowest point to which, in safety, they could be reduced. No new evidence has been laid before us since the passage of that law. Would it now be prudent, would it be wise, would it be just, for that majority, before they can see, or can know, the effect of that law, greatly to reduce the duties then believed to be fixed at the lowest point of safety?

Mr. Chairman: In my poor judgment, the passage of the bill on your table would uproot the foundations of the protective system, and lay low the costly superstructure which the people of this country, under the plighted faith of their Government, have, for a long course of years, been building upon it. The temple of a nation's industry, though the work of time, of skill, and of protracted labor, may, with all its beautiful proportions, its massy pillars, and its ponderous columns, be destroyed in a day. But, sir, days, and months, and years, would not rebuild it. Strangers and foreigners could revel among its ruins, and those whose madness and folly caused its destruction, would become a by-word among the nations.

Sir, pass this bill, and capital will be sacrificed, establishments broken up, and villages depopulated. The price of labor will be greatly reduced; thousands of industrious people turned out of employ, with no means of support; the value of real estate will be diminished; millions of flocks which have been improved and cultivated, with much care and expense, will be destroyed, and the whole country filled with embarrassment, bankruptcy, and distress. If this scene of wide-spread ruin, in one region of country, would be followed by a correspondent benefit to any other portion, there would, at least, be a melancholy satisfaction in the reflection, that the aggregate happiness and prosperity of the whole would be preserved. But no such consequence would be the fruit of this rash measure. Delusive would be the hope that should look for it.

Mr. Chairman: We stand at an interesting point of our country's history. That period of our existence as a nation, which should have been one of brightness and of jubilee, is full of difficulty and gloom. We are intoxicated with prosperity. A wide difference of opinion, as to great and leading measures, divides the minds of those who mingle in our public councils. The powers and duties of this Government, under the constitution, which all profess to revere, are the subject of ardent and bitter controversy. In one quarter of the Union, the authority and solemn decisions of the supreme judicial tribunal of the country, have been entirely disregarded. A respectable State of this Union, denying the constitutional right of the General Government to pass certain laws of universal application to the people of the whole Union, has thrown herself upon her sovereignty, and set the Government and its laws at defiance. The national Executive, in dignified and determined language, has officially declared his intention, by all the constitutional means within his power, to cause the laws of the land to be executed. The manifestations of a design to change the great public policy, under which we have reached the high eminence on which we now stand, is not the least of that combination of evils which, at this moment, obscure our prospects. To say that there is nothing in all this portentous array of difficulties, that ought to excite the apprehensions of the patriot, and arouse him to the cool and deliberate performance of his duty, would be mere affectation. Not to feel a deep solicitude for the honor, the glory, and the happiness of our beloved country, would be criminal stupidity. But, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in all this that should appal or dismay us. In the moral and political, as well as in the natural world, storms and tempests will occur when the agitation of the elements will seem to threaten an universal overthrow. Yet, calms and sunshine have succeeded, and will succeed these irregularities and convulsions. In the short, but eventual history of our own republic, difficulties of the most serious and embarrassing kind have hung over, and threatened us. Under the most appalling circumstances, an appeal has, never in vain, been made to the good sense, the enlightened judgment, and the lofty patriotism of the American people. I have much mistaken the indications of public opinion, if there is not now abroad, among the people of this country, an enlightened, patriotic, and holy sentiment, which will triumphantly carry us through all present difficulties and dangers. Let us, then, who stand here as the Representatives of that people, in the calm possession of all those faculties so essential to right action, march boldly forward and do all our duty. But be careful that we do no more than our duty. There is, in times of excitement, at least as much danger from precipitation, as from action. Be just, fear not, and leave consequences to Him, whose watchful providence sees the fall of the sparrow, and who holds in his hands the destiny of nations.

Mr. DEARBORN having next obtained the floor, moved for the rising of the committee.

The question being put, and tellers appointed, the motion was negatived.

Mr. D. said that as a majority of the committee appeared to choose that the discussion should proceed, although the hour was already later than the usual time of adjournment, he should be actuated on this occasion, as on all others, by the true principles of a republican Government, and respectfully bow to the will of the majority. In a crisis like the present, no man who felt any solicitude for the future weal or woe of his country, could refuse any sacrifice which it might be his duty, or in his power to make for her present prosperity, and future advancement.

The House had been suddenly and most unexpectedly called upon to decide, at once, upon a measure of the deepest importance; and this, almost immediately after having placed the subject to which that measure related, on what had then been understood by all, as a permanent basis. For what object had this Government been organized? For what object were all Governments organized?

The Twif.

[H. OF R.]

Was it not to enable the whole community to do what a part was unable to effect? None who were familiar with the history of this country, down to the close of the revolutionary war, but must see the necessity which had existed of clothing the General Government with ample power to regulate our great national interests, or fail to be convinced that such a Government was indispensable as much to individual prosperity as to the national glory.

Under the old confederation, although we had gained that independence which was the object of our struggle, we found that we were enjoying none of the fruits of that long and arduous contest; foreign competition drove from our workshops every native mechanic; our commerce enjoyed no share of that of the whole world on the great highway of nations; nor could the individual States secure to their own citizens those benefits in which they had hoped to participate, and to which they were justly entitled. All became convinced of the necessity of a power, somewhere, for the protection and security of the great branches of domestic industry. It was these considerations, and this experience, which had led to the establishment of our Federal constitution; and should it not now be considered as more than ever the duty of this House, to further the great end of its creation, by giving and continuing a vigorous protection to every species of the home industry of the country? Here, in this very hall, had been born the genius, the Hercules of our national industry. Here was his cradle, and here was he nurtured and fostered, until he had reached the port, bearing the strength of manhood. This House had sent him forth to perform his great labors; but now, in the midst of them, before the one-half, nay, before the hundredth part of them had been achieved, and at a time, too, when the broad ægis of the republic should be extended over him, for protection against foreign assailants, he is presented with a poisoned tunic—not as a test of his fidelity to his high duties, or of his great merits, but in scorn; knowing it to be impregnated with a subtle and leperous distilment; and while he writhes in the agony of death, one portion of his country looked on, with triumphant satisfaction—gazed upon the fearful spectacle with malignant joy, when the rest of the land were penetrated with the deepest sorrow and commiseration, and are absolutely struck mute with astonishment.

The House were now told that they must accommodate the revenue to the wants of the Government, and that it must not exceed them. Mr. D. did not object to the correctness of this doctrine. He, also, would be in favor of graduating the revenue to the “wants” of the Government. But he differed, mainly, from the committee who had reported the bill in regard to what the “wants” of the Government were. Hitherto the current expenses of the army, the navy, and the civil list, had not been considered as the only wants of the Government.

[Here Mr. D. gave way for a motion which was made by Mr. INGERSOLL, that the committee rise. The motion having been negatived, Mr. D. resumed.]

Every President of the United States, every Secretary of the Treasury, every distinguished legislator and statesman in our country, had looked forward to the period when the national debt should have been paid, as the time when extensive lines of intercommunication were to be formed between all parts of our wide-spread empire, and a system of internal improvement fully developed, which should absorb and apply all the surplus revenue of the exchequer. Hence all parts of the country had been willing to submit to some sacrifice of their wishes for a time, in the hope that, when once the public debt should have been discharged, ample funds would remain to prosecute, successfully and triumphantly, the noblest plans for the improvement of our country. Ever since the last war, infinite pains had been taken by the Executive to obtain, through every channel, such information, and to promote such examinations and surveys as should prepare the way for carrying that great and desirable national object into full execution. Why, else, had the services of the most accomplished engineer of Europe, the illustrious Lieutenant of Napoleon, been secured? Why, else, had our topographical corps, as well as that of engineers, been despatched into all the States of the Union, to take the levels of mountains, trace the courses of rivers, examine the practical lines of intercommunication between the great lakes and the vale of the Mississippi, and with the ocean; sound the depths of our numerous harbors and estuaries, and complete extensive hydrographical and other surveys, with a view to the practicability and expediency of striking out new directions for canals, roads, and railways, and opening new channels for the internal commerce of all parts of the Union, as well as for affording facilities to that with foreign nations? Why had all this been done, if it was not contemplated that these plans were, at no distant day, to be realized, and these various works undertaken and completed? But now, what did he hear? All these works and magnificent projects were unconstitutional, impolitic, inexpedient. That they formed no item in the “wants” of the Government, and that these “wants” were to be narrowed down to the ordinary expenses of the civil and military lists.

It had been anticipated that, besides carrying forward works of internal improvement, some encouragement was to be given to literature, to science, and the arts; that our republic would have given birth to some institutions, which should enable her young men to enter upon her service under auspices as favorable, at least, as were afforded by the old kingdoms of Europe. But this hope was also to be abandoned. Our youth, it seemed, enjoyed such unrivalled facilities for the acquisition of information of every kind, that they stood not in need of the munificence of the General Government; they were already, it must be presumed, capable of rivaling the ablest scholars, philosophers, and artists, of the Eastern continent, owing to their great natural genius and talent, and their unequalled propensity for acquiring information of all kinds. Or do they grasp, by an extraordinary intuition, those great results, which, ordinarily, are obtained by long study, laborious research, the aids of seminaries of learning, extensive libraries, cabinets of natural history, philosophical apparatus, observatories, galleries of paintings, museums of sculpture, and the rich endowments of a wise prescient and fostering munificence?

Mr. D. asked gentlemen to point out to him, during all the most splendid eras of antiquity, or through all the annals of modern times, a single nation which had reached the highest grade of refined improvement and intellectual pre-eminence, that had not had extended to its citizens the fostering hand of their Government. And should we, because we enjoyed a free and republican Government, linger behind the age? Should we be ambitious of falling back into a state of semi-barbarism? Because we were free, was it necessary that we should be as wild and untutored as the savage who roams the wilderness, and required not the embellishment of letters, or the refinements of an exalted state of civilization, but that we should rejoice in our humiliating condition, and luxuriate in degradation, while boasting of the splendid theory of our political institutions? No, sir; so far from it, education is indispensable to the very existence of the Government. The whole people must be enlightened. Intelligence constitutes the deep and broad foundations of the republic; and that magnificent superstructure will inevitably tumble into ruins, unless instruction becomes as universal as the right of suffrage. Civil liberty and ignorance are incompatible; they never have and never can be co-existent. The former perishes with the decadence of moral culture, and is lost in the darkness of benighted intellect.

The Tariff.

[Here Mr. D. again gave way, and Mr. ARNOLD moved for the rising of the committee. The committee refusing to rise, Mr. D. proceeded.]

The reasons on which so great a reduction of the imposts was urged upon Congress, were mainly these: that the present amount of revenue was not required to meet the current expenses of Government, and that the burden fell, in a manner peculiarly hard, and even oppressive, on a particular portion of the country; and a part of it, which was the loudest in its denunciation of a policy, which had originated with Southern men, and had received the sanction of this Government ever since its organization.

If there was any portion of the Union which had a just right to complain of the inequality of the manner in which the revenue was collected, it was the North. The principle which had been ingrafted into the constitution as the ratio of representation, had long been contested in the convention which had framed that instrument; and, after a protracted and strenuous debate, many entertained fears that the subject never could be satisfactorily arranged, and the difference had finally been compromised by consenting that the taxes paid by the several portions of the country should be in proportion to their representation in the National Legislature. When this principle had been agreed upon, it was presumed that a large portion of the revenue would be obtained by direct taxation; and that that part of the Union which depended upon slave labor, and which enjoyed a representation, founded, in part, upon the amount of slave population, would pay an equivalent for that privilege, in the amount of such taxation. But what had been the practical operation of the system? Nearly the whole revenue of the nation had been obtained from the customs; the whole wants of the Government, except during a short period of quasi war with France, and the late struggle with Great Britain, had been derived from this source almost exclusively. And, notwithstanding the loud complaints of the South, he believed it was a fact that could be demonstrated, that the Northern States actually paid two-thirds of the whole revenue of the Union, while the South, at the same time, enjoyed an excess of representation, on the ground of her slave property, amounting to two-thirds of all the votes of New England in that hall. So that they did, in fact, control and regulate the industry of the New England States, and enjoyed a representation amounting to two-fifths of the whole delegation from the slave-holding States. The North, however, had not (recently at least) complained of this state of things; but in the incipient stages of such a system there had been but one voice heard in relation to it, and that a voice of the most decided opposition. The North had, in fact, been driven into it by coercion. Being, however, at this time deeply involved in it, and a large part of her capital vested in manufacturing establishments, she was now asked suddenly to abolish the whole; while on her alone was to fall the whole ruin, and still she was to assent to all this as a great, magnanimous, and patriotic sacrifice on the altar of the republic. There was no part of the Union more willing to do, what the great and general interests of the whole country demanded, than the Northern States. They had proved this—fully proved it. During all the adverse fortunes and perilous struggles which were encountered for freedom, independence, and our national existence, prosperity and glory, they were familiar with sacrifices. Ever since the time when their forefathers first leaped upon Plymouth rock, they had been contending against difficulty, opposition, and oppression, in every form, besides the sterility of an ungenial soil, and the storms of a cold and inhospitable climate. They had long been accustomed, at whatever personal cost or hazard, to perform the great duties, both physical and moral, which they owed to themselves and their country; and even now, if it were desired of them, under any colour of justice, equality, or patriotism, that they should do some great act, beyond all precedent, and all custom, they would be willing to attempt its accomplishment. But here, the sacrifice, instead of being a noble and general act of the whole country, it was to be entirely local in its consequences, and the whole sacrifice was to be on one side only. They were asked to surrender, at once, all their interests, in order to propitiate what appeared to them an imaginary grievance on the other side; and this, too, where no new facts were adduced, nor a single word of argument advanced to show why such a vast sacrifice ought to be made, exclusively on their part; and why it must be made at this moment. The Executive had said that, if the blow must fall, let it fall gradually, slowly, mercifully, so that those who suffered might be as little sensible as possible of the injury inflicted. But the bill they were thus pressed to pass allowed but a single year for the fatal change. It went to destroy, in toto, the two great staple branches of their manufacture. Yes, to destroy them: for a protecting duty of twenty per cent. on woollens and cottons, was, to all practical purposes, just the same thing as a total repeal of all duties on those articles.

Mr. MILLIGAN here renewed the motion that the committee should rise.

Mr. DEARBORN said that if the motion was submitted, with a view of relieving him from the task of proceeding, at that late hour, he begged to observe to the committee that he was ready and anxious to go on to the conclusion of his remarks, being sensible that there was a disposition to insist upon remaining in session until the discussion was closed on the amendment. It was not his intention to occupy their attention much longer.

The vote was then taken by tellers, and there appeared: Yeas 59, nays 61.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. DEARBORN then proceeded with his argument. It would be perceived, on an examination of the principles and details of this bill, that an important change would be effected in the event of its passage, and particularly in the operation which it would have upon one of the most important branches of American industry, the cotton manufactures. The object of the whole bill, the avowed and declared object, was a general reduction of the aggregate amount of duties. Now, the duty for instance, on coarse cotton fabrics is such that they cannot be imported; but if this bill shall pass, and the duty be fixed at one cent and four mills, instead of 7½ cents the square yard, the consequence must follow, that the country will be inundated with them. There are now manufactured in the United States at least 225,000,000 yards of cotton cloth, and if, in consequence of reduced duties, one-half only of the factories were ruined, the quantity imported to meet the demands of consumption, would yield a revenue of 1,500,000 dollars at least. So that, in point of fact, instead of diminishing the revenue, which it could not be denied was the proposed aim of the bill, you are led by it to an increase. If this single provision involved, then, what was considered such deleterious effects in the enhance of the revenue one million and a half, might it not (Mr. D. asked) be fairly presumed, that when all the injurious consequences of the proposed tariff were fully realized, and nearly the whole of our domestic manufactures cut off by the utter prostration of that all-important portion of our national industry, the necessarily increased importation of foreign cotton fabrics, coarse and fine, would be accompanied by an augmentation of the revenue of three or four millions at the least, and, in all probability, of an increase still greater on cottons alone. There could be but little doubt of this fact; the receipts of the customs would speedily show it, and he mentioned it as one of the most striking characteristics of the bill, displaying, he thought, in an eminent degree, the inconsistency of the measure, with the object aimed at, by those who advocated it. But this is not all; for the same act will, as effectually, annihilate the woollen manufactories, and the goods of that material, which must be received from England to fill up the hiatus thus occasioned, will yield an additional revenue, of an amount, at least equal, if not much greater, than that estimated on cottons. He would not enter further into the details of the bill; that had been done already by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, and his honored friend from Connecticut, and in a manner so lucid and able as to bring conviction to every impartial mind, that so monstrous a bill could never receive the sanction of that House. If it should become a law, it would bring a sweeping and irresistible ruin upon the whole country, and the South would ultimately be the greatest sufferers. In the North nearly a generation must have passed away, before that section of the Union could recover from the tremendous shock; but it would recover; for there is a recuperative energy of spirit in the citizens of New England, which enables them to rise superior to the adverse frowns of fortune. They are, from necessity, industrious, patient of suffering, economical, and enterprising. Being born to poverty as an inheritance, it is indispensable that they should unceasingly labor; and as labor is the source of all wealth, individual, and national, they will gradually retrieve their dilapidated condition, and sooner escape from the thralldom of general embarrassment than South Carolina; for there, but half of the population are habitually laborious, and their efforts are directed to the least profitable branch of industry, the cultivation of the earth; a pursuit by which alone no nation has ever risen to eminence, either in wealth, power, or glory. But there, the physical energies directed to that employment, is not only the most expensive, but the least calculated to produce favorable results, if capable of equal endurance with freemen in the fatigues of the field; while, in the North, all are obliged to labor, old and young, male and female; and that their industry is mostly directed to the most profitable pursuits; those by which nations have ever attained the highest rank in the history of civilization; the mechanic arts, manufactures, navigation, the fisheries, and commerce; while agriculture, in all its diversified departments, is the alternate cause and effect of the general advancement of each and the whole. And, in addition to all this, by the wonderful discoveries in mechanics; the mighty invention of the steam engine, and, consequently, the immense power gained to labor-saving machinery, which has been extended to the most simple operations in the useful arts; the aggregate labor of the entire population has been more than quadrupled, making it at least eight times as great as that in the State which denounces us as growing rich upon its oppression, and by plundering the honest earnings of the inhabitants.

Here, then, is the true, the real, the only cause of the more rapid improvement in the condition of the people in the North. It is not the mere effect of tariff laws, but of their universal, untiring, and more lucrative industry; and if the whole system of protection was swept away, the former would not find its position improved, or the difficulties by which it is environed, obliterated. The same species of labor employed in one manner, and mainly on the same culture, would still be the only basis of wealth, and afford the only means of general subsistence and accumulation; of meeting the demands of consumption, and offering the hopes of affluence; while in the latter, although the calamity would, for a period, be more disastrous, and spread ruin and desolation over the rugged, but prosperous clime, of New England, still the people would, in time, repair their broken fortunes, and by seeking out new channels for their enterprise and adventurous action, again assume that thrifty and cheering aspect for which they are now distinguished.

Why, then, make this rash, this hazardous experiment? Why attempt to confer a doubtful benefit on one portion of the nation, when a palpable, and grievous, and inevitable injury, will be inflicted upon another equally entitled to the consideration, and protection of Government.

There was another very serious objection to this measure, and which should not be lightly passed over at a time like the present. In acting upon the subject before them, they were legislating under a menace. Was it proper, was it wise, was it expedient, to proceed under such circumstances? Did their action, under a threat, in the event of not complying with the request of any association, whether a body of individuals, a State, or a combination of States, comport with the dignity of the Congress of the United States, or a just regard for the honor and character of the nation? They were told that there was danger of internal commotion in case this bill did not pass; there was danger of civil war; but even if so—and the very apprehension of such an event was to be deplored—yet war, and even civil war, was not the greatest calamity that could befall a nation. National dishonor is infinitely more to be deprecated. All nations, the most wise, intelligent, and pacific, in all ages, had plunged into war, when justice was to be sought, and reparation for national injuries was to be obtained in no other way. Although he (Mr. D.) was well aware that the most terrific, the most horrible, the most appalling of all wars, were those growing out of the discontents of our own people, our respected fellow-citizens; yet, even under the inevitable consequences which must ensue from such a war, and amidst the reflections which a contingency of this nature must lead to, he could not permit the consideration to operate on his mind, when a duty was to be performed due to his constituents and his country, of such a high and paramount character, as that which demanded that the power of the Government should be respected at all events, and at all hazards. He repeated, that even the anticipation of civil war ought not to shake them from their propriety. What right had a State to array itself against the General Government, and to assume the right and power of deciding upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a law of the Congress of the United States, or the expediency and propriety of allowing it to be carried into operation? Such a power is not to be found in the constitution; and the exercise of such a power ought not to be, must not, cannot be permitted. Every State, and every citizen of the States, were bound to abide by the laws until the question of their constitutionality should have been decided upon by the proper judicial tribunals. The words "State rights" and "State sovereignty," bore certainly a lofty, magnificent, and imposing sound; but they brought his understanding to a very different conclusion from that which operated upon those by whom they were bruited abroad. Such a thing as "State independence" and "State sovereignty" never existed, according to the true and legitimate meaning of these terms, as applicable to a sovereign and independent State or nation. The power of a free, sovereign, and independent nation, never existed in any one of the States of the Union. The gentlemen who maintained such doctrine could not point to the moment of time, when the high attributes of sovereignty now claimed and exercised by a portion of the South, ever were possessed by either of the States, from the period their charters were issued by the monarchs of Great Britain, to this day. Before the war of the revolution, we were dependent colonies, and, as such, we continued up to the time when the spirit of freedom was awakened into decided action at the meeting of the first Continental Congress. The declaration of independence which followed, was hailed as a national measure, and the Congress exercised all the power of sovereignty. That Congress made war and peace, negotiated treaties, raised armies, equipped fleets, created maritime courts, built forts, established military codes, and courts martial, and, in fact, took every measure appertaining to the exercise of sovereign authority. This continued to the period of the confederation, when more enlarged powers were given directly to that body, and it continued thence until the adoption of the present constitution. He challenged gentlemen to show a single instant, during all the successive events which marked this period, when any one State exercised an independent sovereignty; when any one State fell back with such pretended propriety and dignity as is now claimed on its "reserved rights," in the hour of imaginary peril, of presumed wrong, and intolerable oppression. There was no difference in the passage of laws by a State Legislature, in contravention of the laws of the General Government, than in the passage of such nominal laws by a combination of irresponsible individuals. They might give it what name they chose, but he would maintain that an armed resistance to the laws of the United States was, in the words of the constitution, and the language of our statute book, and courts of justice, insurrection; rebellion; high treason. No matter by what name, or under what form, what specious pretext; no matter with whose sanction and solemnities, even under the authority of persons of the highest character, and hold the highest offices; still if a forcible resistance is given to the laws, he, (Mr. D.) knew, of no name by which to describe it, than that which was to be found in our criminal code.

That those who advocated the contrary opinion were sincere in the expression of such opinions—that they numbered among them gentlemen actuated by the highest sense of honor, and of the greatest purity of character, he was not disposed to deny—it could not be denied. But, considering, the wonderful changes which had taken place, and were daily taking place, before their eyes, it could not but be admitted that madness exists somewhere: it was evident to him, he repeated, that either he was demented, or that sanity was wanting in the South. It might be said, that the doctrine of nullification must be the correct one, or it would not be held by men of such high attainments, and such enlarged views, as some of its supporters unquestionably are. But, Mr. D. said, there is a species of political metaphysics which bewilders the greatest minds. Even among the ablest astronomers, mathematicians, and writers on the philosophy of the human understanding, and its pursuits, they would find many, or indeed most of them, indulging in the wildest systems, propagating the most preposterous ideas, following the most vague conceptions, supporting the most chimerical and absurd theories, and losing themselves in the perplexing mazes of the vainest and most idle speculations. The great Descartes, a man pre-eminent for his erudition, his extensive learning, his vast scope of intellect and exuberant imagination—a genius which gave tone to the age in which he flourished, was deceived and bewildered in the profound depths and inextricable involutions of his own magnificent, yet absurd, theory of the universe. In the wide range of those most distinguished for their attainments in the science and the philosophy of the mind, there was scarcely an author who belonged to the infinitely varying schools of metaphysics, with the single exception of Locke, who had not been dazzled and confounded by the dreamy conceptions and evanescent shadowings of their own brilliant fancies, and whose bright and glorious theories had not vanished

"Like the baseless fabric of a vision,

"Leaving not a wreck behind!"

There was nothing tangible in their speculations, or in the deductions to be drawn from them. And, after all, what was there to be looked to, as resulting from the researches of the most acute intellectual power? Nothing but the establishment of some great truth, which can contribute to the advancement of human happiness. I have excepted the immortal Locke from that class of eminent authors, who claim the province of developing the mighty attributes of the human mind, to trace the measureless aberrations of thought, to scan the evanescent scintillations of reason, to open that sealed book which contains the mysterious secrets of the soul, and to reveal that lofty spirit of man, which seems to prompt to aspiring conceptions, like the emulous soaring of a divinity. For Locke, alone, of all that imaginative class, has poured the light of reason upon a subject which has engrossed the attention of so many renowned writers in every age and country. Metaphysicians have been proud to claim him, as giving honor and dignity to their school of moral philosophy; but he is infinitely above and beyond them; for, like Newton, he sought truth, the only worthy and proper object of inquiry, and his efforts were crowned with triumphant success. Let us not then be deceived by any specious theories, and bear in mind that there are political as well as all other kinds of metaphysicians, and that their systems are too often as chimerical and extravagant in character, as they are dangerous and revolutionary in consequences; and when we find they are zealously propagated, and have obtained willing advocates among any portion of the people, does it not behoove us to be on our guard against delusion; to seriously reflect, and shrewdly doubt assumptions which are of most deleterious influence, and tend to endanger the stability of the Union? Should not the young, at least, be forewarned to go back to other times, to examine into the fundamental principles of the constitution, and seek to gather wisdom from the lessons of the honored head, and the experience of the venerated sages of the land.

At a time like this, when the whole country is excited, and we are, apparently, on the eve of momentous events, big with the fate of this vast empire, and of the cause of civil liberty throughout the globe; when our future destinies are dependent upon the policy by which the National and State Governments are guided; and when a false step may be ruinous to both, and most disastrous to the whole people—who can doubt of the expediency of taking counsel of the most able and accomplished statesman this country has produced, as to the rights of the States, the powers of the Federal Government, and the interests of the people. For, who can hesitate to be guided by the advice, and governed by the opinions of one, whom but to name was to praise—the great commentator on the constitution, the revered sage of Montpelier. That distinguished and virtuous man, with his mighty faculties still clear, bright, and energetic, as when presiding over the fortunes of the republic, in the plenitude of his fame, was now beyond the influence of ambition, and could be actuated only by the purest and most patriotic motives. And him we now behold faithful to the principles by which he has been ever governed, still maintaining the same constitutional doctrines which he had so ably advocated at the period of the adoption of the great charter of our rights. And where, Mr. D. inquired, is the man, in this broad land, to whose opinions more honor and deference is due, than to those of James Madison? After having filled with applause the highest offices in the gift his fellow-citizens, he had retired to the enjoyment of private life in the shades of Virginia, and he was there waiting but the summons of Omnipotence to join his great compatriots in the bright realms above.

Mr. D. went on to delineate the course pursued by Mr. Madison in the convention, and to the ability with which, as one of the illustrious trio, Madison, Jay, and Hamilton, by whom the principles of the constitution had been developed and advocated in the memorable numbers of the Federalist. These pure doctrines he had supported in the National Convention, and that of his own State, while a member of Congress, while Secretary of State under Jef-erson, and carried into effect when occupying the position of Chief Magistrate of this Union. He was now the last of those honored and glorious men, those distinguished statesmen, who had put their names to the holy decalogue of our liberties, the constitution of the United States; and was it not singular, indeed, that the opinions of one whose character is marked by so many excellent and beautiful attributes, should be disregarded, and this, too, at a time when present and coming events render them, if possible, of more inestimable value? That the efforts of a mind so lucid in conceptions, so clear and true in its inductions; a mind which still continues to shed light, and intelligence, and glory, on all subjects upon which it is directed, should fail to dispel the doubts in which this startling, this all-engrossing question is, by some, considered to be enveloped.

Mr. D. adverted to the letter recently written on the subject of constitutional powers, and observed, that to him he would go for knowledge, instruction, and advice, as did the Israelites of old, to their venerable patriarchs, in the times of their greatest tribulation and darkness. Younger men than that revered patriot, may possess as wide a scope of talent, or as great a range of thought; but the energies of their minds had not been matured and softened down by the consummate knowledge of mankind, to be acquired only in the long years of an experience like his. His opinions were made still more irresistible and irrefutable by a life, prolonged as it has been, and as it may be devoutly hoped will be, for the blessing of his country; a life unstained, and blameless of reproach, through a long succession of years. It was this which stamped on the opinions of James Madison, a value and authority beyond those of any other individual in this nation. If, in his own State, opinions variant from his, had since been broached, and ably maintained, by far younger men, it would seem to him, that so bright a career as that which, with wonder and astonishment, they had beheld for so many years, would be sufficient to cause them to hesitate, as to the soundness of their own views, when they had, in the midst of them, one, whose whole, pure, un sullied, and illustrious life, was, in itself, so stern a rebuke of the course they were pursuing.

God knew that he (Mr. D.) had once hoped that this country would be blessed beyond all others. That she was destined to a career brighter and more glorious than any which had yet adorned the page of history. Yes, he had seen the sun of her political glory ascending resplendently from the horizon; he had beheld him climb the skies with increasing brightness, and just as he culminated in the ecliptic, and was filling the whole firmament with his effulgence, he appeared, prematurely, to grow pale, dim, and lurid; and either suffered an unexpected eclipse, or was suddenly changed to a portentous and baneful meteor, rushing madly from the zenith, and soon to be quenched in the frowning darkness of an interminable night. But, Mr. D. had hoped for more favorable auspices. He had gazed with amazement, with the deepest interest and solicitude, on the lowering and fearful aspect of the heavens, and doubted not that it was but a partial, transient, and temporary penumbra, and the glorious orb would again burst forth with renewed splendor.

This republic had triumphantly passed through many severe ordeals. Our free Government had successfully encountered innumerable difficulties, which seemed to threaten its speedy destruction. It had endured the whirlwinds of party strife; the withering influence of embargoes and non-intercourse; the appalling horrors of insurrection, and the tremendous shocks of war itself, with accumulated vigor and increased prosperity; and it would again come forth, with undiminished grandeur, from the deep gloom of impending rebellion and civil war, and long continue to bless our own favored and flourishing country, while it irradiates the world with its cheering effulgence.

He trusted in God that the pillars of our own magnificent temple of liberty would not be shaken by the earthquakes of public commotion; and he feared not, that its lofty dome, looming like a beacon light to the oppressed of every clime, would be hurled in fragments upon the desert air, by the furious tempest of a sanguinary revolution.

The committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS REVENUE.

Mr. STEWART offered the following preamble and resolution, and moved that it be laid upon the table:

Whereas it was declared by the President of the United States, in his message at the opening of the first session of the twenty-first Congress, that, after the extinction of the public debt, it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, on principles satisfactory, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the treasury beyond what may be required for its current services; and that, in his opinion, "the most safe, just, and federal disposition that could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their representation," which recommendations have been since reiterated in subsequent messages from the same high source: And whereas the President has congratulated Congress, at the opening of the present session, upon the near approach of the period referred to, when the public debt will be entirely extinguished, and a considerable surplus remain in the treasury; therefore,

Resolved, That the sum of five millions of dollars (if the surplus revenue shall amount to so much) shall be annually apportioned among the several States, according to their representation; one moiety thereof to be appropriated to works of improvement of a national character, and the other to the purposes of general education; and that the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. WILDE moved the question of consideration, viz: Will the House now consider the resolution?

Mr. STEWART suggested to the gentleman from Georgia, that the resolution might be suffered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WILDE demanded the question of consideration.

Mr. STEWART inquired of the CHAIR if the refusal now to consider would preclude him from moving its consideration hereafter? Being informed that it would not, he said he did not wish the House now to consider the resolution, but that at some future day, after time had been afforded to examine it, he would move for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. WILDE said that, in a crisis like the present, he could not withdraw his motion, though he regretted not being able to comply with the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question of consideration was then put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS--Messrs. So the House refused to consider the resolution.

CHANGING LOCATION OF LAND OFFICES.

The bill to enable the President to change the location of land offices having been read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. VANCE opposed the bill. Had it provided for the consolidation of such land districts as did not pay for the expense of maintaining separate land offices, he should not have objected to it; but he disliked both its provisions; for it often happened that the location of a land office at a spot without the district to which it belonged, was often a great convenience to the people of such district; as an instance of which he referred to the location of a land office at Cincinnati, where the people were in the habit of going on in their ordinary business. He knew of but one office that had been removed by order of the Executive, and this had been done at the suggestion of an individual who sought to wreak his vengeance on a person who had offended him, and it had occasioned great uneasiness and discontent. The other feature of the bill, to which Mr. V. was opposed, was the placing of absolute discretionary power in the President to change the location of land offices at pleasure. He would place such a power in the hand of no man.

Mr. IRVIN advocated the bill. As to the consolidation of land districts, it was a subject that had long been before the Committee on the Public Lands; and his colleague would probably have the opportunity even of voting on a bill for that object. The instance of the land office at Cincinnati was not in point, because that office was situated within, and not without, the district to which it belonged. Many officers had been removed in consequence of the improvement of the country; having, at first, been situated without the limits of the districts.

Mr. VANCE here explained; observing that provision had been made from the first to have such offices removed as soon as necessary.

Mr. IRVIN differed as to this fact. With reference to the discretion of the President, inasmuch as the power must be placed in the hand of some individual, to whom could it better be confided than to the Chief Magistrate, who had been again placed, by so vast a majority of freemen, at the head of the Government? The President was too high-minded to be under temptation to abuse the discretion confided to him.

Mr. BURD admitted the President to be as fit as any other individual; but he trusted that the will of no President would give law to this country.

The debate was here cut short by Mr. VERPLANCK'S calling up the Orders of the Day.

The House thereupon went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of

THE TARIFF BILL.

The following amendment was offered by Mr. BURGESS to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That whenever any of the goods, wares, and merchandise, which, by the provisions of this act, or of any other law of the United States, are charged with impost or duty to any amount, payable at any time after entry thereof, shall, after the first day of February, A. D. 1833, be imported into any district of the United States, comprehended within the territorial limits of any State, which State, or the people thereof, has already, or hereafter shall, by any ordinance, statute, or law, made, or which shall be made, by such people or State, whereby the payment of any bond, note, or written security, for the payment of such impost or duties, at any future time may be or is, such ordinance, statute, or law, intended to be in any way prevented, hindered, obstructed, embarrassed, or delayed, it shall be the duty of the collector, and all other officers of the United States employed in any manner in the collection of the revenue within said district, to cause the amount of all such impost or duty on all such goods, wares, or merchandise, to be assessed and paid thereon in money, deducting therefrom the interest up to the time when the same would otherwise be payable by the provisions of this act, or any other law of the United States, before any entry of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or the ship or vessel in which they were or shall have been imported, shall be made, or any permit to land such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be given. And on failure of payment of all such impost or duty assessed as aforesaid, excepting the interest deducted as aforesaid, said goods, wares, and merchandise, and the ship or vessel wherein the same shall have been imported, together with the master thereof, and the people navigating the same, shall forthwith be liable to all the disabilities, forfeitures, and penalties, to which, by the laws of the United States, goods, wares, and merchandise, ships or vessels, and masters and mariners navigating the same, are liable in cases where no report is made, or manifest exhibited, to the proper officers of the United States, or where goods, wares, and merchandise are landed, or attempted to be landed, without securing the imposts or duties, or obtaining a permit for the landing thereof. And it shall be the duty of the collector, and all officers of the United States, to proceed therein accordingly.

Mr. KENNON, of Ohio, then rose and said, that in rising he made no promise that he should occupy the attention of this committee but a few moments. Such promises were seldom performed, although often made in this House. I may extend my remarks, said he, to a considerable length, or I may contract them within very narrow limits. The subject under consideration is one of grave importance, and pregnant with consequences of no ordinary character. Should this bill not become a law, it is said that the Union of these happy States is dissolved. Should it become a law, it is alleged that bankruptcy and ruin are the consequences to the manufacturers; that large establishments reared up by the fostering care of this Government will be destroyed; that the same power which legislated them into existence, by protecting their products against foreign competition, will, by a counter act of legislation, and that, too, in violation of plighted faith, have prostrated them in the dust. If, therefore, I should examine at considerable length a subject of so much importance, this committee, I hope, will excuse me, especially as I am not in the habit of trespassing upon its time.

The object of this bill is to reduce the revenue to an amount equal to the necessary expenditures of the Government. That the revenue should be so reduced, I had supposed was a proposition to which none could object. I had supposed that there was not one member of this House who doubted the propriety of such a reduction. I still think that opinion is entertained by a large majority, of both of tariff and anti-tariff men of this body. I, therefore, move the consideration of that point. The first matter of controversy which arises, is the amount of revenue necessary for the expenditures of the Federal Government.

The Tariff.

[H. OF R.]

In the remarks which I intend to submit to this committee, I shall assume the fact that fifteen millions of dollars is a sufficient amount for that purpose. I will take the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the committee which reported this bill, as correct—so far as they relate to the necessary amount of revenue—although in their estimate, it seems to me they have not taken into consideration certain claims against this Government, which it is as strongly bound to pay as the constitution itself can bind it. I allude to the claims of our own citizens for French spoliations committed prior to 1800, amounting to from five to nine millions of dollars. The only two questions which can be seriously made are, when should the revenue be reduced to the wants of the Government, and how should it be so reduced? To these two questions, I propose to call the attention of the committee. When should the revenue be reduced to the wants of the Government? Not when should the revenue commence to be fifteen millions of dollars, but when should we legislate upon the subject of reduction?

At the last session of Congress we passed a bill, with a full knowledge of the near approach of the extinction of the public debt, and of the consequent necessity of the reduction of the revenues of this country.

Much of the time of this House, and of the money of this country, was spent in considering and maturing that bill. We prolonged the session to a very unusual length; and, finally, agreed upon the bill by a very large majority. The ultra tariff and anti-tariff men voting against it. Not one provision of that bill has yet gone into operation. The time at which it is to take effect has not yet arrived. The committee which reported it to the House, had given its provisions long and laborious investigation.

Can any good reason be given why we should now retrace our steps, repeal the act of last session before it takes effect, and say to our constituents, and to the world, that all our late legislation upon the tariff was improper, was wrong, and the time occupied therein uselessly thrown away? What new light has been shed upon our darkened understandings to authorize any such course?

It is true that South Carolina has attempted to nullify the revenue laws, and threatens to dissolve the Union in effect, unless this Government wholly surrender the principle of discriminating and protecting duties. I know it is said that this is a delicate subject, and ought not to be touched. Sir, I entertain no such opinion. The proceedings of South Carolina, in their conventions and public meetings, are public property, and I shall speak of them fully and unreservedly, but respectfully. Do those proceedings of South Carolina form a reason why we should now pass the bill under consideration? It seems to me not. It seems to me that we should act upon this subject precisely as we would have done if no such movements had taken place in the South; although I confess it operates a little against human nature to be forced to do right. If it be proper that this bill should pass now, we should pass it regardless of that consideration. If it be improper, the Carolina proceedings would not make it right. Suppose, however, we were to pass this bill at this session, would it satisfy South Carolina? No, sir. This is not the bill which she requires at our hands. This bill contains the protective principle. The committee avow it, and the bill shows it. Some of the Pennsylvania iron, for instance, is to have a permanent protection of 95 per cent. The Virginia tobacco has a protection of 33 per cent.—a protection which amounts to a prohibition of the importation of that article into this country. These are not revenue duties. They are protecting duties. Will South Carolina be satisfied with such a bill as that? So far as she is concerned, will you gain any thing by passing this bill now? We will hear what she says upon that subject. I read from the address of the South Carolina convention a few extracts: "Having now presented for the consideration of the Federal Government, and our confederate States, the fixed and final determination of this State in relation to the protecting system, it remains for us to submit a plan of taxation, in which we would be willing to acquiesce in a spirit of liberal concession, provided we are met in due time, and in a becoming spirit by the States interested in the protection of manufactures."

"We believe, upon every just and equitable principle of taxation, the whole list of protected articles should be imported, free of all duties, and that the revenue from imports should be raised exclusively from the unprotected articles, or whenever a duty is imposed on the protected articles imported, an excise duty of the same rate should be imposed on the article manufactured "in the United States." Again, it is said: "But we are willing to make a large offering to preserve the Union, and with a distinct declaration that it is a concession on our part. We will consent that the same rate of duty may be imposed upon the protected article that shall be imposed upon the unprotected, provided that no more revenue be raised than is necessary to meet the demand of the Government for constitutional purposes; and provided, also, that a duty substantially equal be imposed upon all foreign imports." In another part of the address it is said: "Under these circumstances we cannot permit ourselves to believe for a moment, that in a crisis marked by such portentous and fearful omens, those States can hesitate in according to this argument, when they perceive that it will be the means, and perhaps the only means, of restoring the broken harmony of this great confederacy. They most assuredly have the strongest inducements, aside from all considerations of justice, to adjust this controversy without pushing it to extremities. This can be accomplished only by the proposed modification of the tariff, or by a call "of a general convention of all the States."

And again: "If we submit to this system of unconstitutional oppression, we shall voluntarily sink into slavery, and transmit that ignominious inheritance to our children. We will not, we cannot, we dare not, submit to this degradation; and our resolve is fixed, and unalterable, that a protecting tariff shall no longer be enforced within the limits of South Carolina. We stand upon the principle of everlasting justice, and no human power shall drive us from our position. We have not the slightest apprehension that the General Government will attempt to force this system upon us by military power. We have warned our brethren of the consequences of such an attempt; but if, notwithstanding, such a course of madness should be pursued, we here solemnly declare that this system shall never prevail in South Carolina until none but slaves are left to submit to it. We would infinitely prefer that the territory of the State should be the cemetery of freemen than the habitations of slaves. Actuated by these principles, and animated by these sentiments, we will cling to the pillars of the temple of our liberties, and if it must fall, we will perish amidst the ruins."

This, sir, is the language of the people of South Carolina. They say to you, in language which no man can misunderstand, that no protecting tariff, no law containing the protecting principle, shall ever be enforced within the limits of South Carolina; that they would infinitely prefer that her territory should become the cemetery of her freemen, and that before they will submit to such a system of oppression, they will perish amidst the ruins of their country. I hope the day may never come that the citizens of South Carolina shall so perish. God forbid that it should ever be necessary for any man to imbrue his hands in the blood of a son of South Carolina—

The Tariff.

or that a son of South Carolina should stain his with the blood of a brother of this Union. We are children of the same fathers, who fought hand in hand together in the revolution. Who bled not for themselves, but for us; who perished, that they might transmit to us, their children, that glorious inheritance of liberty which we now enjoy. It is the price of their blood, and shall we, so soon after they have been consigned to the silent tomb, scatter that inheritance to the four winds of heaven, and become engaged in that worst of all evils, a civil war? When that day comes, farewell to the liberties of this country. But do we escape these evils by passing this bill? Do we even allay the excitement of South Carolina? She has required too much at our hands. She not only demands a total abandonment of protection, but that it must be done in due time, and in a becoming spirit. Yes, sir, she asks that it shall be done in a becoming spirit! There is one other alternative which she presents to preserve the Union; and that is a convention of all the States, to determine whether the constitution has conferred the power on Congress to pass laws protecting domestic manufactures. She will abide by the decision of that convention; but how does she propose the decision shall be made? Why, sir, three-fourths of the States must decide that the power is delegated, or the decision is, that it is not delegated; and this she claims to be in accordance with the spirit of the constitution of the United States. In other words, if seven States in such convention should say that any power was not conferred upon Congress, then the decision would be, that no such power was conferred. For instance, suppose a convention of the States called for the purpose of determining whether the General Government possessed the power of selling the public lands within the States, or whether those lands did not become the property of the new States so soon as those new States were admitted into the Union. This is a question which has been frequently and solemnly made by some States in the Union. Now, sir, there are public lands in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. These seven States have on the floor of this House twenty-six Representatives; all the other States have one hundred and seventy-eight; and yet, in such a convention, the members from these seven States would possess the power of deciding that those lands belonged to them, and not to the General Government, and thenceforth the land would belong to them. This would seem at first blush to be an inequitable distribution of power; and it would be so. But this is not the greatest injustice which would flow from the adoption of such a principle. It would be making those seven States judges in their own case, and authorizing them, (if South Carolina doctrines be true,) in accordance with the spirit of the constitution, to take the interest of the other seventeen States in these lands, and appropriate them to the use of the seven. It would, to all intents and purposes, be transferring the power from the majority, and vesting it in a very small minority. The impropriety of the doctrine does not end here. The members from the seven States would not only be influenced in their decision by all the motives which interest and avarice could create in the breast of man, but they would not even be acting under the solemnity of an oath to decide according to their own opinion of the constitution, or according to justice and equity; and yet, strange as it may appear, this is the doctrine of the leading politicians of South Carolina, openly published to the world. They claim that the same constitution which authorizes a majority of this House, so far as it is concerned, to make a law, authorizes, in such a convention, the members of the seven States to unmake it. They claim more than that. They maintain, sir, that a law passed by every member of this House and of the Senate, and sanctioned by the President, may be lawfully nullified by a single State of this Union. The doctrine of nullification leads, then, to that result. With the doctrine of nullification, however, I intend, on this occasion, to have nothing to do.

It is of the convention that I have been speaking, one of the alternatives which South Carolina has presented to this country in order to save it from disunion. I have given the single case of the public lands within the bounds of a State, in order to show the absurdity (if I may be permitted to use that word) of the doctrine of conventions as held by South Carolina. The same evils which I have pointed out in the case of the lands, might arise if any other proposition was to be submitted to these conventions. The advocates of this new theory take their opinions from that part of the constitution which requires amendments to the constitution to be ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the States, before those amendments become a part of the constitution; from which they strangely draw the inference that, because the constitution requires three-fourths of the States, in convention, to make an amendment, that, therefore, three-fourths of the States must concur in all constructions of the constitution, otherwise the construction is an improper one. They seem to forget that the framers of that instrument, in that very clause of the constitution, were attempting to guard against any alteration of it without the concurrence of three-fourths of the States. That such was the object of the framers there can be no doubt; and yet, by this South Carolina doctrine, you, in violation of that clear intention, may, by the consent of seven States, change and alter any clause of the constitution. You may indirectly do that which no man would contend you could do directly. These are the two alternatives which are presented by South Carolina. As to the latter, Congress had no power to order any such convention; and if they had, that power would not probably be exercised, when it was understood that seven States might, by construction, alter the constitution itself. It therefore seems to me that those proceedings of South Carolina form no reason why we should act upon the subject of reducing the revenue at this session; much less that we should pass the bill, seeing that it could not possibly be acceptable to South Carolina. There are other reasons why we ought not to act upon the subject now. We are taking a new and important step in legislation; we are taking away from the manufacturer more than half his protection; we are about to settle, and permanently settle, the amount of revenue necessary for this Government. This was not expected before we left our constituents; neither they nor we had thought of such a movement being made; I, for one, have had no opportunity of consulting the feelings of those in whose place I stand upon this floor, and for whom I act. And all this is to be done in a short session of Congress, without any reason being assigned for it by those who urge it upon us. The Secretary of the Treasury has not said that the revenue ought to be reduced. Now, all he has said upon that subject is, that, after this year, it may be reduced.

There is one other reason why we ought not now to act. Some States have upon this floor more Representatives than by their population they are entitled to; others have not near so many as they will have in the next Congress. Hereafter Ohio will have nineteen instead of fourteen members; and surely, if this be a question of so much importance, each State ought to be fully represented when it shall be decided.

For these reasons, my mind has been brought to the conclusion that we ought to leave the decision of this matter to our successors, who will carry with them to this House the feelings and wishes of their constituents, after having had full time to consult and counsel with them.

Suppose, however, this to be the proper time; does this bill propose the proper mode of reducing the revenue?

JAN. 15, 1833.]

The Tariff.

[H. OF R.]

Is this the bill which we should pass? I think not. The revenues of this country are collected from two sources—the public lands and duties upon articles imported into this country.

The articles upon which these duties are assessed are such as are manufactured in the country, and such as are not. Of such as are manufactured in this country, some have been protected against foreign competition by the legislation of this country. Others have not. Those manufactured here, and not protected, as well as those imported into this country, and not manufactured here, are called unprotected articles, and upon which a duty, for the purpose of revenue only, has been assessed.

Whilst this country was largely indebted, the policy of the Government was to keep up the duties on the unprotected articles, and raise as much revenue as could be done consistently with the abilities of the country. Upon the protected articles there had been a higher duty than upon the unprotected. A duty had been placed upon articles imported into the United States, and which came in competition with the like articles manufactured here, sufficiently high (in many instances) to enable the manufacturer here to sell his article without a duty, full as low as the importer of the same article from a foreign country could sell his, after having paid a duty on bringing it into this country. That public debt is now nearly discharged, and the disbursements of the United States lessened about ten millions every year; and, consequently, the duties upon these protected and unprotected articles must be so arranged as to reduce the annual revenues about ten millions of dollars; or, in other words, to reduce the revenue to fifteen millions.

Now, sir, the question is, does the bill propose the proper method of doing it. If the whole revenue were to be collected from a duty on articles imported into, and not manufactured here at all, there would be much less difficulty in arriving at the proper amount. The amount of importation, or consumption of those articles, could be then ascertained, and a duty assessed at such a rate as to produce the amount, or very near the amount of revenue desired. But when you undertake to reduce the duty on the protected article, or rather on the imported article coming in competition with the protected article, so as to produce a specific amount of money, the difficulty is greatly increased. There is a point in the ascending scale, to which, if you raise the duty on those articles, you will receive no revenue at all. For instance, take tobacco: There has been, and now is, by this bill, a duty of thirty-three per cent. on the importation of that article. The foreign tobacco is taxed out of the market. The duty amounts to a prohibition of the importation, and secures the domestic market to the producer in this country. Take also the manufactures of wool, and increase the duty to a certain point, and you will have the same result—a result, however, which would be more sensibly felt by the bill passed last year. It was contemplated to raise a revenue on the finer woollens of about three millions of dollars. If you now raise the duty on imported woollen articles, so as to produce the effect which you have on tobacco—a prohibition of the imported article, you, instead of increasing, will cut off the whole revenue arising from this source.

There is also a point in the descending scale to which, if you reduce the duty on the protected article, you will greatly increase the revenue. For example, I will again take woollens: It is estimated that about forty millions of dollars worth of woollen fabrics are manufactured within the United States, and of the fine woollens about six millions worth imported; making the whole consumption of woollens about forty-six millions of dollars in value. A large portion of which, however, is manufactured by families for their own use. The duty on the fine quality of woollens is now fifty per cent., and of which there is a large quantity manufactured here. You propose by this bill to reduce the duty from fifty to twenty per cent. on that article, and thereby reduce the revenue to a little over one million. If fifty per cent. bear at all a necessary protection for these woollens, (and it would seem from the amount imported and sold, with a duty of fifty per cent., there was some reason to believe that it was not an unnecessary protection,) it does not, at all events, amount to a prohibition of the article, as the duty on tobacco does. But to come to the point which I proposed: Suppose that, by reducing the duty on woollens from fifty to twenty per cent., you give the foreign article an advantage over the domestic, in the markets of this country, and thereby lessen the manufacture in this country of that article twenty millions of dollars; you, of course, increase and make the importation of these woollens about twenty-six millions. Upon this supposition, instead of reducing the revenue to one and a quarter millions, you will increase it to five millions of dollars; and, although such may not be the result of this bill, if passed, yet I think it would be found to be not very far out of the way. It will, therefore, be perceived that it is no easy task to raise a definite amount of revenue by duties upon articles imported into this country, and coming in competition with the like articles manufactured here.

To reduce the revenue to a certain and definite amount, whether you raise it upon the protected or the unprotected articles, or both, is not the business of one, of two, nor of three sessions of Congress; you must arrive at that point by repeated acts of legislation. You cannot settle that amount by any one act of legislation; time will prove the truth of this assertion. No man can tell within several millions of dollars how much revenue would be raised either by this bill or the one passed last year. Let us, therefore, try the one we have passed before we pass another. By the one already passed, we reduced the duties on certain woollen cloths, which are used almost entirely in the South, to a point far below even a revenue duty; we reduced it to five per cent. This was a partial act of legislation, for the benefit and interest of the South. Of that article there was, during the last year, imported into this country more than one million of dollars worth.

This bill professes to give protection to the manufacturing of woollens, cottons, iron, hemp, sugar, tobacco, salt, and other articles. By the former Legislature of this country, it was supposed that an adequate, and nothing more than an adequate protection, was extended to these productions of this country. If that be true, there is an insufficient and unequal protection given to them by this bill. Upon certain descriptions of iron manufactured in Pennsylvania, you do not reduce the duty more than one-fourth; no, sir, not one-fourth. You give it a permanent protection of ninety-five per cent., while you reduce the duty on woollens something like three-fifths. It is so with many other articles. For the sugar of Louisiana you retain a protection of forty-six per cent.; for the hemp of Kentucky, twenty-eight; but to woollens you give from five to twenty per cent. only. Why reduce the duty upon woollens in a greater proportion than upon those other articles?

At the close of the late war every one felt the necessity of encouraging the manufacture of this article above almost every thing else. It was then, sir, that experience had taught us a lesson which, I had supposed, would not soon be forgotten. We had to procure from the very enemy with whom we were contending, the pantaloons and coats worn by our soldiers, and the blankets in which they slept. Three regiments of men were raised in Ohio at one time. They rendezvoused at Cincinnati; blankets could not be purchased in the country to protect them from the cold. They were neither manufactured nor imported. Whilst in this situation, an address was made to the ladies of that city, by the Governor of Ohio, entreating them to strip their beds and furnish the soldiers with blankets; and, to their credit, and to the honor of that city, they done so. Yes, sir, they threw the blankets from their windows to shivering soldiers in the street. All those who were eye-witnesses of the suffering of the soldiers for want of clothing and blankets, said with one voice, protect these articles, encourage the investiture of capital in their manufacture, that we may have them of our own, without being dependant upon a foreign power for them.

The Tariff.

In 1824, the now President of the United States, believing blankets to be essential in time of war, voted in the Senate to increase the duty on blankets one-third higher than it ever has been by any law. And now it is proposed to reduce the duty on blankets three-fifths. I admit that it is a very difficult matter to say what is and what is not a sufficient protection; but before I can consent to vote for such a reduction, I must be satisfied, by evidence, that it can be made without a total destruction of the woollen interest. I ask that evidence of those who claim that it ought to be reduced. I ask for the reason why it ought to be done. Can any one give it? Can the committee who reported this bill give it? If they can, I desire to hear them. There is about one hundred and seventy millions of capital involved in the growth and manufacture of wool in the United States, and the persons employed in its manufacture is estimated at about one hundred and sixty thousand. The provisions of the manufacturers amount to more than three and a half millions of dollars per annum. These provisions are furnished by the farmer; much of which is produced in Ohio. They create a market for our surplus produce, whilst the ports of England are closed against us. It is to the home market, created by these very manufactures, that we look for the sale of our wheat, flour, pork, and beef. Destroy the manufactures of this country, and you destroy that market. Sir, Ohio has been engaged in the construction of expensive works of internal improvement, and is now involved in a debt of about four millions of dollars, for a canal which she has cut entirely through the State. Destroy the manufacturing establishments of this country, and you not only cut off the market for our staple commodities, and take away our means of paying that debt, but you do more, you take away the tolls arising from the use of it, the intended means of paying the interest of the debt. A large portion of those tolls arise from the transportation of the flour, wheat, &c., of which I have been speaking; and whether they are taken North or South, the larger portion of them finally find a market within the United States, and in those manufacturing establishments.

This is not the only effect which the destruction of these establishments, and of the woollen interest, would have in Ohio. By your legislation you have invited, yes, sir, you have bribed the people of my country to invest large capitals in the raising of wool; you have promised to them the market of this country, and, in fulfilment of that promise, you have compelled the man who brought any wool from a foreign country to pay seventy per cent. on it. Now, sir, by another act of legislation, you propose to destroy this capital also. But if the wool of this country being destroyed would appease the South, I would do it; I would sacrifice large interests to do it. But, sir, South Carolina has said what she will and what she will not accept.

I have shown that her request cannot now be complied with, and that this bill will not answer the purpose. She will nullify your laws, and apply her own remedy to the legislation of this country. One word upon this doctrine of nullification. So far as the tariff is concerned, it can be put in operation only in those States where there are ports of entry. There the importer pays the duty, and the effective operation of nullification is to prevent the payment, by the importer, of the duty. In many of the Western States we have no ports of entry, and no duties are paid in the first instance. We pay, in the purchase of the article, to the merchant. We might nullify as long as we pleased, and produce no effect in preventing the collection of the revenue. In South Carolina it is otherwise. So that you see nullification can only be put in execution in the Atlantic States. It is a remedy which is only in the power of States having ports of entry, and therefore an unequal remedy.

To return to the bill, I will say, in conclusion, that I, for one, cannot now vote for this bill. I am well satisfied that any thing which I might say on this subject could not change a single vote; and, although I had prepared to give my opinion on the constitutional power of Congress to assess discriminating duties, yet I will not occupy the time of the House on that point, but will yield the floor to those who may be desirous of addressing the committee.

Mr. CHOATE, of Massachusetts next addressed the committee. He said that he should vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] which struck out the duty on tea and coffee, and then, whether that amendment were adopted or not, he should vote against the bill. It has seemed to me, he said, that it is not practicable at this session, if it were desirable, to frame an entire new tariff fit to receive the sanction of Congress. I am not quite sure that it is desirable to do this, if it were practicable.

It would be mere affectation in me, sir, to pretend not to see that this bill is introduced because South Carolina has, prospectively, nullified the law which we made in pari materia, five months ago. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means does not, to be sure, say this in his speech, or in his report; but there is not a man, woman, or child, in the United States, who does not know it, and who would not laugh in your face to hear the contrary asserted. Why, sir, upon the apparent circumstances, who can doubt about it. The tariff of the last session, whatever else might be said against or for it, was no very hasty piece of legislation. A committee of this House, constituted for that very purpose, were three months in framing that bill which was its groundwork. In one form and in one stage or another, the bill was pending before us two or three months longer. It was under actual discussion more, I believe, than one. The public attention had been recently very much drawn to the subject. Conventions had been holden; memorials had been composed; and a vast body of fact and argument had been furnished to us by the sections and interests most opposed and most sensitive upon this policy. After all this, the bill passed with a surprising unanimity through both branches of Congress, and I cannot say that it has not been pretty well received by the people. Certainly, the administration presses have unceasingly declared that it had the approval of all but the ultras on both sides; the manufacturers and the nullifiers.

That tariff has not yet gone into operation. How it may work, therefore, how much revenue it may yield, what effect it may produce upon prices, commerce, manufactures, or the agricultures of the South, how far it may approve itself upon a full experiment to the judgment of our constituents, the American people, upon all these matters, you know absolutely nothing which you did not know when you set your hands to it. Without the examination of a single witness, without the reading or presentation of a single memorial, without a particle of new information, whether of fact or science, on the merits of this business as a question of finance or political economy, the Committee of Ways and Means have struck out at a heat in three weeks, a new tariff, departing fundamentally from the provisions of the last, and overturning, not formally, I concede to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEXTON,] who had just resumed his seat, but substantially overturning the American protective system.

The Tariff.

Sir, I repeat it, it is impossible for me to doubt the motive or object of this proceeding, unexampled in our legislation. Do not deceive yourselves by supposing that the country and the world also will not see clear through it. Let us not shun a fair responsibility on this great occasion. Why not avow it at once, and put yourselves thereupon on the country. South Carolina has nullified your tariffs; and therefore you repeal them. You suppress nullification, and take a statesmanlike pledge and guarantee against any future recurrence by any other State to that happy expedient, by just promptly granting the first time you have a chance to act on it, all that it demands.

But, sir, I shall consume no time in complaining of the committee for having cast the consideration of this subject again on this Congress. If we can make a better tariff than the last, or rather if we can make a really permanent and good one, without the neglect of weightier matters, I do not think the attitude of South Carolina alone ought to prevent our doing so. While I hold undoubtedly that our main and first business at this session is, to provide for effectually enforcing the law, if in that behalf there is any thing for the Legislature to do, I could wish to improve the law also, if it requires to be, and can be improved.

But this bill is no improvement of the law. Come what may, I shall not assent to it. Some of the principles it proceeds on are well enough; some of the ends it seeks not undesirable. But the honorable chairman will pardon me if I say that, as a whole, it is a great deal too rash, partial, and revolutionary. He will pardon me if I say I see on it some marks of the unwise precipitation of fear, and some of the still more offensive marks of political calculation and combination. Instead, however, sir, of attempting to dissect it minutely, and to display its objectionable details, I have risen only to suggest some more general grounds on which I oppose it, and on which perhaps, the expediency of passing even a far better bill than this in the circumstances, may well be questioned.

There is one view of this great subject of the tariff, in its relation to the times we are approaching, in which the importance of very deliberate action on it, upon the part of the National Legislature, is quite striking. I cannot hope to impress it on others as it has presented itself to my own mind.

We have reached the time, or rather we are within a year or two of the time, when it will become necessary to meet and settle a question in some sense new; a question involving the fate of our existing manufacturing establishments, and perhaps the fate of American manufacturing enterprise. The question is this: Can the tariff be so arranged, that it shall produce no more revenue than the wants of a Government out of debt and wisely administered, indispensably demand; shall incidentally give effectual protection to capital now invested in manufactures, and shall, at the same time, work no sectional injustice to the planting States. Such a tariff alone can be maintained in this country. Such a tariff, by the blessing of providence, can be maintained. Such an one can be framed; but time, and an opportunity of calm, thorough, untrifled deliberation, are indispensable to a work so great, and healing, and difficult.

The first requisite of a tariff, which shall meet the exigency of the times, is, that it brings down the revenue "to the wants of the Government." A very few words only upon this:

I consider it to be the settled opinion of the country, that the national revenue ought to be restricted to, and measured by, the necessary annual expenditure of the Government, out of debt, and economically administered. The public demand is, I think, that the tariff be so constructed as to yield that amount of revenue, and no more; and if the tariff of the last session shall be found, on a full experiment, to yield more than that, sooner or later it must, of course, be altered. In other words, if fifteen millions a year will administer the Government, fifteen millions are all which we can permanently collect from imposts.

The constitutional power of Congress, however, to levy duties beyond the requirements of revenue, and without reference to revenue, for the protection of manufactures, under the clause which authorizes the regulation of commerce, I hold to be incontestible. We may so exert this power as to bring, year by year, a greater or smaller surplus into the treasury. The argument to prove that we possess this power, is irrelevant to my purpose, and, besides, has been exhausted. Mr. Madison's letter, the letter of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to another honorable member of this House, [Mr. DRAYTON,] and the address of the convention of the friends of domestic industry, published in the latter part of 1831, leave nothing to be said on the affirmative side of this constitutional question.

But the public temper is against such an exertion of this power, as shall produce a surplus in the federal treasury.

The distribution of the surplus, it seems to be apprehended, would be a delicate and invidious, if not dangerous business. A vote of the House this morning, seems to indicate that our minds are not yet fully made up on the practicability, or expediency, or right of effecting such a distribution. On the other hand, the accumulation of money annually in the hands of the Government, is still less to be thought of. Upon this point the opinion and practice of all modern States are decided and uniform. No Government lays up gold or silver, or any other form of wealth, in its coffers; and its only recourse, on a deficiency of taxes, is to loans. The practice of ancient States, in this particular, was remarkably otherwise. You recollect, sir, that Hume, alarmed I believe, by the enormous and growing debt of England, argues ingeniously to show that the old politics were the soundest. He instances among others the national treasury of Rome. There, in the same year, with the expulsion of the kings, in the very first year of the republic, the consular Government began the accommodation of gold and silver, the property of the State. For more than four hundred years, the fund went on growing, year after year, by little and little, like the strength and glory of the republic itself. From a thousand sources of supply, tributes of conquered kings, gifts of nations from fear and policy, and extortion, spoils of a long succession of victories, fines of condemned criminals, the earnings and savings of republican frugality; through a thousand different rivulets money flowed into a treasury, capacious to receive, but giving nothing back, down to the time of the battle of Pharsalia. In all the varieties of the national fortunes, it was never broken in upon but once, after an exhausting war of more than twenty years, until Cæsar entered the city at the head of his legions, and in one day despoiled it of its treasures and its liberty. There is nothing in such an instance, certainly, to tempt us to imitate it; and I hold with the received opinion, that a treasury emptied annually, a nation out of debt, lightly taxed, a prosperous, and contented people, are the best proofs and fruits of a skilful and republican scheme of finance.

The bill under consideration professes to be an attempt to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government; and, so far, I have nothing to object to it. How far it may effect its object, or how far it may go beyond its object, is another question. It assumes further, that fifteen millions of dollars will satisfy the annual wants of the Government. Upon this, too, I have nothing to say. But it further proceeds upon the supposition, that, of this sum, two millions and a half will be supplied by the sales of the public lands, and the other twelve millions and a half by the imposts. I submit to the committee, sir, that the imposts ought to be made to contribute from the first, the whole fifteen millions, or whatever be the sum which you decide to raise.

The Tariff.

I trust that any scheme of revenue now to be adopted is intended for permanence. The interests, commercial, and manufacturing, affected by every fluctuation of duties on imports, are so vast and so sensitive, that it is as criminal as it is foolish, needlessly to tamper with the tariff. Now, the ground I go upon is, that the public lands will not much longer continue to contribute any thing to the federal treasury; that, if you now arrange the tariff upon a calculation of two and a half millions from this source, it will very soon be necessary to re-construct it; and that it is wiser and kinder to set your rates of duties at first where they must ultimately stand, than to reduce them below that point, to the certain injury of those interests which such legislation operates against, raising them again when the mischief is incurably done.

I put it to any gentleman of the committee to say, if he believes that the public lands will much longer yield any thing considerable to the national treasury? Sir, as a source of federal revenue, for federal expenditure, they are given up by common consent. There are two propositions in substance in relation to them before the country. One of these provides to graduate their prices, to sell them for a little time longer, at nominal rates, to settlers or speculators, and then, at as early a day as is possible, to cede the vast residue to the States respectively within which it lies; thus adopting the Executive recommendation in its whole extent, and "abandoning the idea of a revenue from the lands." The other proposes still to derive a revenue from them; but to divert it from the national treasury, and to distribute it among the States. Bills embodying these propositions are pending before both branches of Congress, and one or the other will probably become a law. Be it which it may, this source of revenue is, for ordinary times, dried up. To the imposts then, sir, to the imposts, for direct taxation, is out of the question—you must come at last, and soon, and exclusively; and when you consider how slight a touch here will vibrate throughout all your circles of industry; when you consider the effects inevitable on every re-arrangement of the tariff; the enterprises it embarrasses, the speculations it stimulates, the hopes and fears it awakens, the shock with which it strikes upon the employments of one great division of the general labor—I entreat you, sir, in view of these things, throwing out all temporary, occasional, and uncertain sources of supply, place your new system of revenue fairly at first, where it must stand at last, upon imposts.

If these suggestions should be approved by the Committee of the Whole, a re-committal of the bill becomes necessary. The gentleman who reported it, says, indeed, that the failure of the revenue expected from the lands, will not derange its plan. Sir, I do not understand this. He tells us that fifteen millions per annum must be raised, and he tells us, too, that his bill will give but twelve and a half. If the lands do not supply the deficiency, he must obtain it by re-arranging the duties; and that is just the derangement of his plan which I desire to avoid.

But there is a deeper objection to the bill. Assuming, sir, that a tariff is to be constructed which shall supply from imposts the whole national revenue, and no more than you need for revenue, then the great question is this: Can the principle of an effectual protection of the existing manufacturing establishments be embodied incidentally in such a tariff, without injustice to the planting States? Sir, I believe that it can; and I am wholly against this bill because it makes no attempt to do it.

Look into the bill and say if these rates of duties are sufficient for the preservation of your leading manufactures? Why, this House has concluded the question. You have framed, this very assembly has once already framed, a tariff of protection. Yes, sir, the law of the last session, enacted after a series of investigations of unexampled minutes and toil, is the deliberate, recorded, promulgated judgment of the whole National Legislature, that the duties in that law are indispensable to the adequate protection of your investments in manufactures.

Now, is there a particle of new evidence, is there one single argument good or bad, old or new, is there so much as a suggestion from any quarter of this House, that, on point of necessity of that degree of protection which you decided to give last summer, your judgment was erroneous? So erroneous that you may now take off seventy-five per cent. of that protection without fear of the consequences? Sir, we know there is nothing. This bill is not put forward as a protecting tariff. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, has not said on this floor, or in his report, and will not say that he believes this rate of protection is enough. He does not press the measure upon you on that ground. He argues that it will reduce the revenue to twelve and a half millions, and he claims no more for it. No verbal or written testimony has been taken by the committee, and none is furnished to the House. Some manuscripts of matter purporting to be answers of manufacturers to the interrogatories of agents of the Secretary of the Treasury, are said to be in the hands of the public printer; but nobody knows their contents, or attaches any sort of importance to them.

I have heard, in conversation, that the tariff of 1816 gave adequate protection, and that this bill is a return to that tariff. Did we not know last summer what protection the law of 1816 gave, and did we not pronounce it to be wholly inadequate? Besides, sir, this bill is not a return to the provisions of that law. If that were intended, why are the duties on iron carried so much higher? Do you say that the manufactures of iron are essential to the defence of the nation in time of war, and, therefore, deserve to be protected? Very well; but this plainly admits that the law of 1816 does not afford the desired protection. And again; if you take that tariff for your standard, why do you withdraw from the manufacturers of woollens and cottons, the protection of which they enjoyed under it? No sir, I shall not admit against your vote of five months ago, that these duties will sustain any great branch of the national manufactures. I am estopped by the record, and bow, as I ought, to your own authority. I must take it for this discussion, without pausing to collate this bill with former tariffs, item by item, and without attempting to calculate the exact rate per cent. of the proposed reduction, that the measure goes in its inevitable, and not very remote effect, to disturb and derange the whole manufacturing enterprise of the country, and particularly to break down the great body of the establishments of New England.

Is there any thing in the circumstances of the time which makes all this necessary? Sir, I cannot believe it. I believe you may construct a tariff which shall yield fifteen millions of revenue; effectually protect domestic manufacture; and do injustice to no portion of the country. This is the great problem now proposed to the wisdom of Congress. I beg leave, sir, to say a few words only for the purpose of showing that such a tariff may be made, but that perhaps new investigations, perhaps new modes of inquiry on the Government, are necessary to an object so important and so difficult.

I confess, sir, it is not until very recently I have supposed that a tariff, producing so much revenue only as the wants of Government year by year demand, would be resisted by the South, merely because it sought to unite with its main object of revenue, in its selection of articles, and its distribution of duties, the protection of domestic industry. We have heard much about the burden of unnecessary taxation; against wasteful and corrupt expenditures of public money; against plundering the people with one hand, and dealing out the spoils here and there to this portion of them and that, with the other. These topics are familiar enough in our discussions here and elsewhere; but that which has been somewhat technically called incidental protection, I thought had been spared this general denunciation. I had supposed the sentiments ascribed the other day by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. INGERSOLL] to a distinguished Virginian, [Mr. BARBOUR,] expressed the prevailing Southern opinion on this subject. When the tariff was made bona fide for revenue, where it was so framed as to produce no more than the necessary revenue for an economical administration of a Government out of debt; where, in its "gross and scope," as a whole, acting as one tax on one people, it drew from them only the proper amount of tax, I had supposed, sir, that such a tariff would not be objected to, merely because in its details it favorably regarded the interests of American manufactures. One thing is certain: the constitutional competence of Congress to make such a tariff has hardly been questioned, I believe, by those who have questioned every thing else. In the address of the convention of the friends of free trade, put forth in the latter part of the year 1831, I find these passages. They occur in the midst of a regular argument against the substantive constitutional power of Congress to make a protecting tariff. "They admit the power of Congress to lay and collect such duties as they deem necessary for the purpose of revenue; and, within those limits, so to arrange these duties as incidentally, and to that extent, to give protection to the manufacturer.

The Tariff.

"They deny the right to convert what they denominate the incidental into the principal power, and, transcending the limits of revenue, to impose an additional duty, substantially and exclusively for the purpose of affording that protection."

The writer of an article in the Southern Review, published in August, 1830, a writer who, with zeal and talent maintains the doctrines of nullification, and the want of constitutional power to make a tariff of protection, says: "South Carolina has never contended that, in pursuing bona fide the legitimate object of revenue, a bill for this purpose may not be arranged in such a manner as incidentally to benefit the domestic industry of the country."

Sir, I agree that there is some ambiguity in this language; but it seems to me to admit, in the broadest terms, our constitutional power to make just such a tariff as the times demand; a tariff yielding just enough, and no more, to the treasury, yet so taxing, and so exempting from tax articles imported, as effectually to protect the manufacturing capital and labor of the country.

But, sir, we know now that our friends of the planting States take stronger ground. They now say that, even if the tariff produce only the necessary amount of revenue, it cannot be so constructed as to protect manufactures, according to the Northern opinions on the requisite degree of protection, without injustice to the South. Such a tariff will admit some imports free of duty; it will tax some heavily, others lightly; and this "arrangement of duties" must, as they allege, from the habits of consumption and of production, peculiar to the planting States, act with a sectional injustice and hardship on them.

Now this allegation of the South presents a question of fact of great interest. It has been discussed at former sessions of Congress, with eminent ability on this floor.

It is the turning point of the controversy which threatens, not to rend these States asunder, that is an absurd apprehension, but which threatens to prostrate every manufacturing establishment in the country. I do not say that it is capable of being conclusively determined. Perhaps it is a problem which must forever baffle all attempt at solution. But, sir, before this Government shall take for granted this strong, and no doubt sincere, assertion of its Southern citizens; before it shall doom to destruction the vast interests which itself has warmed into life, upon the supposition that it can protect them no longer without injustice to others, I submit that something ought to be done by the Government, as a Government, through some department, or committee, or board of commissioners, to settle this question of fact. It would be a reproach to politics, to legislation, to science, if it could not be settled by a proper course of inquiry, with some approximation to moral certainty. I know, indeed, something of the obstacles which the passions put in the way of the pursuit of truth. Perhaps Hobbes, if it was he, was not so far in the wrong when he said "that, if their interests required it, people would deny that two and two make four." But, sir, "difficulty is good for man." We are fast approaching a real crisis in the history of our manufactures. We are told we can no longer protect them, and do justice to the South, even if heretofore that was practicable. We cannot put this question aside; we must meet it; and it involves the most momentous domestic controversy which this country was ever engaged in. Sir, the position I take is this: that this House is not prepared to admit—cannot, as a matter of justice, and expediency, and honor, admit, without more inquiry, that a tariff, producing fifteen millions of revenue, and effectually protecting domestic manufactures, will operate with any peculiar and sectional injustice and severity on the planting States.

In the first place, before we venture against our recorded acts of the last session, to take a matter of so much importance for granted, I say we ought to have before us, for inspection, the project of a bill yielding fifteen millions, and so framed as to protect manufactures. No such bill was ever submitted to this Congress. This, from the Ways and Means, that committee tell us, will produce twelve and a half millions only, and it makes no attempt towards effectual protection. The tariff of last session, it is said, will produce twenty millions. What we ought to have, from some committee, or some department, for analysis, is a tariff, put together by express instruction of this House, in such a manner as to raise a revenue of fifteen millions, without injury to existing investments; and, as far as practicable, without injustice to any distinct section of country. Then, sir, there would be something definite to act upon; there would then be a specific plan of taxation before you, under which some imports would be free; some lightly and some heavily burdened; the articles would be enumerated, and the rates fixed. We should know then the terms and conditions of the problem to be solved. We could then subject the planting States to a minute comparison with other States, in regard to their habits of consumption and production, with reference to a given scheme of finance. The question then would be, taking into account the character of the consumption and production which distinguish the two great divisions of the country, which of them, under this precise scale of duties, will feel the heaviest burden, or will it fall in just proportion on each? I repeat, sir, the first step towards a proper trial of the question, involved in the representation of the South, would seem to me to be to call on the Committee of Manufactures, or of Ways and Means, for a bill of this character. Until we can see, and can dissect such an one, I shall not admit, in deference to any abstract reasonings, however ingenious; to any declamation, however eloquent; to any complaints, however loud or general; that it may not be made to unite all the three requisites which must meet in a just, popular, and permanent tariff; that is, that it bring no surplus into the treasury, encourage and save manufacturing investments, and do no local wrong to the South.

H. OF R.]

The Tariff.

But, sir, without waiting for the project of such a tariff, we know, to some extent, what it must be; we know, in general, that it will lay a heavier duty on articles coming in competition with our domestic manufactures; and a lighter duty, if any, on articles not coming in competition with them, than the average of a mere uniform ad valorem revenue duty. And, now, is this House prepared to admit, without more inquiry, that such a distribution of duties works any sectional wrong to the planting States?

In considering this question, let the tariff first be regarded as a great indirect tax on consumption paid by consumers. I know that this view of the tariff is narrow and inadequate; it is, however, to a great extent, the true view of it, so far as you look to the burdens only which it imposes. It is a law laying taxes on consumption, which are paid by consumers. The question is, do these taxes fall disproportionately on the South?

In this way of considering the subject, the only ground on which the alleged inequality of this tax, in its operation on the planting States, can be made out, is this: that those States consume a larger value of imported articles paying heavy duties under such a discriminating tariff, in proportion to their whole consumption or ability, than the other States; that they consume a larger value of imported sugar, woollen cloth, cotton cloth, articles and materials of occasional and extra dress, household furniture, mechanic tools, iron, steel, hemp, flax, cordage, chain cables, sail cloth, oil and dyeing materials, and the like, in proportion to their whole consumption, than the other States. Now, do the planting States, in point of fact, consume a larger amount of such articles than the rest of the Union, according to their ability? Sir, I utterly deny it. I assert the direct contrary. I tender an issue, and respectfully pray that the same may be inquired of by the country.

In the first place, sir, it has been alleged on this floor that the planting States do not now, and never did, consume so large a value of all imported dutiable goods, in proportion to their numbers, as the other States. In particular, I recollect that the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGES,] in his able speech at the last session, took this position very strongly. In the resolutions which he laid some days since on your table, he reasserts this position. He told us that the records of the treasury and custom-houses will sustain him in it. They will show you, or rather you may collect from them, with reasonable certainty, the whole value of imported dutiable goods consumed year by year in the whole country, and the value of those consumed in the Southern States; the whole amount of duties collected on them all, and the amount collected on the portion consumed in the Southern States. The result of the examination will be, that the complaining States have never paid, from the organization of the Government to this day, an amount of the indirect taxes which have mainly borne the entire national expenditure, in just proportion to their numbers, their whole consumption, and their general ability.

Sir, if the fact be so, it is a most important one. If it be so, that under no tariff, at no time, those States have paid a fair, constitutional proportion of tax, is it certain that under a protecting tariff of fifteen millions, they will pay more than their proportion? Is this so certain that you will take it for granted, without inquiry, and without trial, and prostrate your manufactures on the assumption?

Sir, in this view, the resolutions for inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, seem to me eminently reasonable and proper. I submit that we should immediately call out all the evidence to this point contained in the treasury and custom-houses; and, in the absence of that higher proof, I shall hold that the gentleman has truly stated to us the result of it.

But, sir, there is another mode of proof to which we may resort, and to which, through some department or committee, or board of commissioners, this Government is bound to resort, before we rashly conclude that protection to domestic manufactures and justice to the South cannot be combined in a revenue tariff. Looking, sir, beyond the records of the treasury and custom-house; at the habits, occupations, and modes of living, which distinguish the two great divisions of the people; judging from these, as men who know the country for which we legislate, where is there the largest proportional consumption of imported articles coming in competition with the domestic manufacture; and, therefore, heavily taxed by a protecting tariff? Certainly not in the planting States. Certainly the labor, and the middle classes, "the pillars of the exchequer," in the North, pay a heavier tax, in proportion to their whole consumption, under a tariff discriminating against such articles, than the labor of the South. Such is my opinion. But, if so, it puts an end to the whole controversy. The allegation of the planting States, that they are taxed more than a constitutional proportion by a protecting tariff, is silenced. Instead, therefore, of asking you to concur with me in the opinion, I entreat only that the House itself will inquire minutely and officially into the grounds of this opinion.

Is not this matter of fact immensely important in this deliberation? If by that mode of laying an indirect tax which protects your manufactures, you do not throw even a full constitutional share of tax on the planting States; if you tax yourselves out of all proportion more than you tax them, will you, on their complaint, adopt another mode of arranging the tax, not due to their rights, but destructive of your interests? Sir, I do not think it would be unbecoming this House, nor inappropriate to its duties at this exigent moment, to institute some such mode of inquiry as that indicated by the gentleman from Rhode Island. No duty of an American statesman requires so much minute and precise information concerning the habits of consumption, which distinguish one portion of the American people from another, as this of laying taxes. Climate, occupation, custom, the standard of comfort and enjoyment, the state of arts and manufactures; the character and colour of the population—these causes produce marked diversities between the consumption of different States. A tariff may be so arranged undoubtedly, as to fall disproportionately on the consumption of a single State, or group of States, and if so, it is unjust. Whether such a tariff as would just supply your treasury, and protect your manufactures, would lay a tax so unequal, is the question. Try the issue then as becomes the wisdom of a parental and just Government. The best mode of conducting such an inquiry, is worthy of your most anxious deliberation; but, however conducted, the result would be to supply you a vast body of information, valuable for many uses, incalculably so for the lights it would shed on this great controversy.

Sir, if declining all inquiry, and taking for granted the allegation of the planting States, you decide this day to prostrate the rising manufactures of your country, what a spectacle you present to the world! Suppose an intelligent foreigner to interrogate an American citizen upon the matter, how do you think our countryman could make him comprehend our conduct? The foreigner would say that he had understood, with much surprise, that this Government had recently determined, to sacrifice the American manufacturing investments, amounting to some hundreds of millions, to the skill, and capital, and energies of England. The answer would be that this was true. I suppose, the inquirer would continue, that a majority of your people, or of the States, had become convinced that the protecting policy was unwise or unavailing, and, therefore, gave it up? Nothing like it; a large majority of the people, and of the States, were strongly, and with a clearer perception of its value than ever before, attached to it; more and more every year, they saw, in a steady adherence to it, the means and the assurance of individual enjoyment and of national wealth, power, and aggrandizement; a small minority only of the people, and of the States, believed themselves oppressed, or at least not benefited by it. But does not the majority, acting in good faith, for the greatest good of the largest number, give the law in your system? In theory it does so; and in better times it did so practically. I suppose, however, that the majority were satisfied that the policy of protection did operate oppressively on the minority, and, therefore, magnanimously, if not wisely, relinquished it? No, not so; there was not a man of them believed any such thing; they uniformly, every where, and most sincerely denied it; in that very Congress which at length repealed the tariff, they proposed to the complaining minority to unite with them in any, and every conceivable mode of inquiry, to ascertain whether it overburdened them or not; they offered to submit to arbitrators, to go to the jury, to put it to the court; all was refused; nothing would satisfy; and they absolutely pulled down the whole system of legislative protection at length, to rid themselves of what, in their consciences, they believed to be a wholly groundless importunity. Sir, I think our foreigner in politeness could make no other answer to all this, than that we were a wonderful people.

The Tariff.

I have thus far been considering the tariff as an indirect tax on consumption, paid by the consumers of imported dutiable goods. In that way of considering it, I never could comprehend the Southern sectional objection to it. To give colour to that objection, it should be shown that the States which urge it, consume a larger value of imports paying the heavy rates of duty, in proportion to their whole consumption, which is always in proportion to ability, than the other States. Not a tittle of evidence, in proof of this position, was ever offered to this or any other Congress. The presumptions are all the other way; we utterly deny the position, and offer to unite in any mode of inquiry which can be suggested to ascertain its truth or falsehood.

It is sometimes said, sir, that the consumer in the planting States pays a tax to the Northern manufacturer. This, like all violently metaphorical and incorrect language, is calculated to mislead the mind. It may be honestly, but never can be safely employed in any reasoning. Closely scrutinized, it means nothing, or nothing to this purpose. It means only that he who (instead of buying a foreign article, paying the price, and reimbursing the duty) buys a domestic article, pays a price perhaps somewhat inflated, perhaps not at all so, by the circumstance that the imported fabric is charged with a duty. It is delusive and mischievous to call this the payment of a tax. The article has never borne one; the vender paid none; the buyer reimbursed none. So far from this, he who substitutes the domestic for the foreign fabric, pro tanto, evades the tax. If, then, you buy of the Northern manufacturer, you diminish your contribution to the public burden; if you buy nothing of him, you still pay no more than your share. On what ground, then, do you complain of a protecting tariff as an indirect tax? You demand, instead of it, a tariff laying a uniform ad valorem duty on all imports. Well, why? You see that you do not now contribute more than your proportion of indirect tax to the federal treasury. Would you contribute less?

Do you say, however, that the Southern consumer of domestic manufactures pays to the manufacturer a price enhanced by the imposition of duties on the similar imported manufacture; and that he thus bears a burden, though he does not pay a tax? I answer, first, that if the price is so enhanced, it is enhanced as well to the Northern as to the Southern consumer; there is nothing sectional in the alleged grievance. I say, further, that all the leading American manufactures are, all things considered, rapidly and successfully establishing themselves; that the time is speedily coming when a protecting duty will be unnecessary, or rather will not be felt at all by the consumer in the price of articles; and that, therefore, within the sensible and temperate doctrine of Alexander Hamilton, and even of Mr. Gallatin, as expressed in the memorial of the free trade convention, presented to this Congress at its last session, the present temporary inconvenience ought to be submitted to by the individual, for the sake of that ultimate and certain compensation, a diversified, vigorous, and national manufacturing industry.

Before leaving this topic, I beg to advert to a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States in opposition to the tariff of 1824, by a gentleman now very high in the Government of South Carolina. A portion of the speech he employed in anticipating the unfavorable sectional operation of that tariff on the cotton-growing States. In the course of this part of his remarks he enumerated two or three articles which he said were peculiarly of Southern consumption; the tax on which, therefore, he argued, would fall disproportionately on the South: Of these were plains and osnaburgs. Now, sir, how entirely practicable to preserve the general system of protection in its utmost efficiency, and yet do no sectional injustice. In the tariff of last session, this article, plains, is admitted under a duty of five per cent. ad valorem; and osnaburgs under a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem; less than the average of a uniform ad valorem mere revenue-duty under this bill. Sir, the truth is, the great body of imported articles coming in competition with American manufactures, do not enter into a full proportion into the consumption of the South; and where, there is an exception to this general fact, it is perfectly easy to relieve the particular article, which is mainly of Southern consumption, from the operation of a protecting tariff.

Let me remind you, sir, that in this view of the sectional action of the tariff, as considered as an indirect tax on consumption, I have the very high authority of a distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDuffie.] In the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, made at the last session of this Congress, he says: "So far as the protecting duties operate merely as taxes on consumption, there can be no great inequality in the burden imposed upon the different portions of the Union; and, whatever inequality there may be, as it is founded on a larger consumption, it may be fairly presumed to be accompanied by a corresponding ability to consume."

I know, sir, there is another ground on which the unequal and unjust action of the tariff on the planting States is argued. There are those, a few such only, who believe that the duty imposed by the tariff is not all paid by the consumer; that a part of it is thrown back on the importer of British goods, or the manufacturer of those goods, or the exporter of Southern staples, exchanged for them, or the producer of those staples, or that it is, in some way, divided among them all; and that the result is an unfavorable operation on the cotton planter, abridging the demand for his products, or diminishing his profits.

In this view of the matter, the tariff is no longer a great indirect tax merely; it presents itself as a national policy, complex in its bearings and influences. Thus considered, the question is not, whether it is equally, positively, and palpably beneficial to every part of the country, and to every individual of every part. It is enough if beneficial in its general action; it puts no considerable section in a worse condition, taking all its good and all its evil together, than it would be without it. If such be its character, it is as just, impartial, and wise, as belongs to human legislation. But, sir, with regard to this theory of an unfavorable operation of the tariff on the producer of Southern staples, as such, as a producer, it is enough to say that this House wholly rejects it. It was advocated at the last session on this floor with great ability; yet down to the end of that session, there were not thirty members, I think, who adopted it. In all the South, out of South Carolina, I doubt if it had thirty disciples more. What new light may have broken in since, and through "what chasms and openings of ruin," I know not. But I venture to say, that, if this were the whole of the case made against the tariff, the House would dismiss it, and dismiss this bill without another moment of deliberation. Surely you would not pull down this fair fabric of industry and art, which, these forty years, have been slowly building up; you would not turn these free laborers from their employments by thousands; you would not slaughter the sheep, put out the furnaces, break in pieces the machinery, and turn to waste the water power of your constituents, upon a theory which you are not certain you comprehend, but if you do comprehend, are certain you do not believe it?

H. OF R.]

The Tariff.

I do not know that any inquiry which this House could direct to be undertaken, would throw light on this theory. It rests rather on abstract reasoning than on any conclusions from known or asserted facts; and derives more aid from a powerful and subtle logic than from the philosophy of induction. But if we inquire at all concerning this matter, let our inquiry be broad and comprehensive, embracing and displaying the whole sectional operation of the tariff on the planting States. Let us inquire, if we have any about it, whether it has not caused a fall of the prices of all imported and domestic manufactures consumed in these States. Let us inquire whether it has not enlarged the entire market, including both divisions of it, domestic and foreign, of Southern staples; whether it has not enlarged the domestic demand for foreign goods of all sorts which must be paid for by Southern staples; whether it has not withdrawn capital from cotton planting, to the production of sugar; whether it has not kept up the saleable value of slaves, quoted, I perceive, in the Richmond prices current of this morning, at higher prices than they ever brought before; whether it has not retained Northern labor at home to consume the wheat, rice, tobacco, and cotton of the South, instead of sending it out thither to produce those articles; and, generally, whether the region of planting States has not thriven indirectly, at least, by connexion with a country which, as a whole, has prospered exceedingly under this policy of protection. Such a range of inquiry, sir, will disclose a beneficial sectional operation of the tariff, something more than enough to compensate for all the evils imagined by a theory not yet proved; believed no where; certainly not yet sanctioned by the judgment of this House.

Sir, the same gentleman, to whose speech in the Senate, on the tariff of 1824, I have just alluded, anticipated an advance of the prices of the articles heavily taxed by that tariff. Every one of them has fallen in price. He anticipated a total loss, or great abridgment of the market for Southern staples, and particularly cotton. Yet see how immensely that market has gone on enlarging. He predicted an increase in the cost of transporting those staples to Europe; and freights were never lower than they are at this moment.

I submit, therefore, sir, upon the whole, that we should not pass this bill, because it assumes that a tariff producing only the necessary revenue, cannot be constructed to give effectual protection to manufactures without injustice to the South; a position which I deny; and which, let me say, we cannot admit consistently with our own solemn responsibilities to our constituents, to the nation, to that tribunal "at which nations themselves must one day answer."

I have long thought that the arrival of the time when it should become necessary to reduce the revenue to fifteen millions annually, would bring a real crisis in the history of our manufactures. It is well, perhaps, that we have a year or two yet to prepare for it. Within that time, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. INGRAM] has shown, that all our present sources of income will not yield that surplus to which some gentlemen look forward with so much hope, and others with so much apprehension. Meanwhile, sir, the friends of the American protective system, we, who believe that manufactures are essential to fill the measure of a country's glory, and that some degree of artificial and legislative aid is necessary still longer to the encouragement and growth of our own, have a great task to perform. A reduction of the revenue we cannot prevent, and we would not if we could. But if we are true to ourselves, a reduced revenue may be made effectually to protect the interests we seek to cherish. There is a whole constellation of States against us on the plea, always respectable, that the policy we would perpetuate is oppressive and unjust to them. Let us neither too rashly admit, nor wholly refuse to listen to this plea. Assured ourselves that it is groundless, let us spare no pains; let us decline no mode of inquiry; let us help to collect and display every species of proof and illustration, to satisfy them that it is groundless also. Out of those States there are active and powerful interests against you. The public mind is excited and apprehensive. Appearances here and there are unpleasant, and revolutionary. It is just the time for men to act in. Take care of the industry of the country. Sir, if groundless fears, hasty judgments, intimidation, the cunning of politicians out of this House, who would trade away the sweat of the brow of free labor for the votes of the masters of slaves; if any, or all of these things, should scatter and divide us among ourselves, we are lost, indeed, and we are all lost together. How long do you think the navigation of this country would continue to pay that tax on iron, after the iron tax is all that is left of the tariff?

Mr. Chairman: There is one more general reason why this House should not now pass this bill, or any bill at all resembling it. That is a fatally bad measure in itself, that it disturbs and endangers all the manufacturing investments of the country, and sacrifices especially those of New England. This, sir, indeed, is enough to decide my vote. But if it were not quite so palpably and radically bad, I should hope it would be promptly rejected. Sir, the actual motives on which gentlemen will perform the duty which this occasion devolves on them, will be various and secret, and all deserving respect. By me they shall not be impeached or questioned. Some, undoubtedly, will vote for the bill upon a consistent and avowed and settled hostility to the protective system. Some, perhaps, because their interests are spared, and those only of their neighbors and allies are sacrificed. Some, again, upon an honest apprehension for the integrity of the Union. But, sir, the country, history, will stamp this proceeding as a concession to the sovereignty of South Carolina.

And may I be permitted respectfully to ask the tariff majority of this House, those who framed the details of the law of last session, and carried it through, and who hold this question in their hands, may I ask you, on what ground, if it is not the attitude of South Carolina, you give your votes for this bill? Believing, as you do, that a tariff may be made which shall meet the pecuniary wants of the Government, the claims of domestic industry, and the rights of the South, and reconcile them all: believing, as you do, that the plighted faith of Congress, the just expectations of vested interests, and the prosperity of the nation demands such a tariff, on what ground do you vote for such a bill as this? You do not believe that it gives the necessary degree of protection; for if so, you admit that you voted five months ago for more protection than was necessary, by seventy-five per cent. You do not believe that justice to the South demands this act from you; for, if so, you admit that you were guilty, at the last session, of gross and known injustice. You have learned nothing new of the general hostility of the Southern States to the protecting policy; you knew at the last session that they were all against it, and yet you thought yourselves obliged to disregard their opposition.

The Tarrif.

There is but one ground on which you can account for the vote you give for this bill, and it is, that South Carolina has nullified every existing tariff. But you deny her right to nullify the law; and you agree with the President; you agree with the people speaking through their local Governments, their primary assemblies, and the press, as with a voice of thunder, that she must submit, though she were the fairest and dearest of the whole sisterhood of the States. You propose, then, to abandon a policy, sixteen, or rather forty years old; sanctioned by every President and every Congress; by the acquiescence of a large constitutional majority of the people; by a long, splendid, and robust national prosperity; a policy to which, five months ago, you gave your sanction; to abandon it without inquiry, without instruction from your constituents, yet against their known interests and presumed will; to abandon it, not to justice, for you do not believe that justice demands it; not in deference to the opposition of a respectable constitutional minority, for that you have all along thought it your duty to disregard; but in deference to this strange, half-peaceable, half-forcible, wholly unconstitutional interposition of a single State?

Sir, it is for those, if any such there are, who, out of this House, are pressing this bill along, from any motive of political ambition, to consider how it may affect the chances of public men for high office, thus to make nullification a triumphant and recognized part of our already sufficiently complicated system. It is for us, the members of this House, who believe "that the preservation of the General Government, in its whole constitutional vigor, is the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad," and that "absolute acquiescence in the decision of the majority is the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism." It is for us to pause long and anxiously before we do any thing to establish the precedent, fraught with all unimaginable and immitigable evil, that a small majority of a single State, whether of the fourth class, or the first, shall make the laws of this Union. Sir, in this view, our situation is undoubtedly one of interest and responsibility. Thank God, however, our duty is as plain as it is important. Sir, these unauthorized risings against the law, I will not call them what the law calls them, revolts, rebellions, treason, are among, I do not say the ordinary, but they are among the inevitable and not unfrequent perils which menace all human Governments. Remember, they are the same under our system that they are under every other. Our federal constitution, and our separation into States, may give them force, organization, complexity; but they do not change their nature. Essentially, here, and every where else, they are things irreconcilably antagonist to the rightful supremacy of the public will. Here, and every where else, there is but one of two alternatives for choice. They must be put down by the Government, or the Government must be put down by them.

How quick and high would the pulse of this nation beat, if a foreign power, of the first class, should demand a repeal of the tariff upon a threat of a declaration of war. Would to God it were our enemy that had done this? Then, all the proud sentiments and energetic passions of man would come in aid of the colder suggestions of duty, and honor, and patriotism, and public virtue, and the love and the hope of glory would rally from the East, the West, and South, alike, to execute the national will. But, sir, although it is not our enemy, but our own familiar friend, they of our own household, whom we have loved and honored, and trusted, that have risen against us; although on that field there are no laurels to be won, and, as I hope, most sincerely, and believe with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KENYON,] who has just resumed his seat, no blood is to flow there—yet have we a great civil and pacific duty to do, and wo unto us if it is not wisely and firmly done! Sir, I judge for no other member of this committee—far be such presumption from me; but for myself, I say I should feel the longest day I have to live, that I had shrunk from the performance of my part of that duty, if I voted for this bill, or any bill in any considerable degree resembling it.

Mr. GILMORE, of Pennsylvania, followed. He said he rose to address the committee after a struggle between diffidence and duty. The occasion, and the reference made to him, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, which reported the bill, seemed (he said) to require it.

My colleague [Mr. McKENNA] appealed to me (said Mr. G.) in particular, to say whether I had received any expression of opinion from my constituents, which would justify the course I have taken in relation to this bill. I would say, in reply, that it is the duty of the President to recommend to Congress, from time to time, such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

The President did, in his late annual message, earnestly recommend to Congress a further reduction of duties. This message was responded to with approbation, not only in the district in which I reside, but throughout the State. Is this no expression of opinion? But, besides this, I have received numerous letters from those in whom I can confide, and who have a deep stake in the country, all breathing the same spirit, (with a solitary exception,) advising moderation, forbearance, and concession, and save the Union; and recommending a reduction of the duties to the wants of the Government, and moreover, stating that it was all idle in this enlightened period of the world, to think of holding the Union together by physical force—that the strongest tie was a moral sense of justice. I feel fully justified in my course. I have the advice of those who are near and dear to me. I have the advice of a father and of a son. I can the more readily comply with their wishes, because they are in accordance with my own opinion.

Great responsibility rests upon the action of this Congress. We have arrived at a critical period in our Government, where one misstep may seal our ruin; a healing policy alone will answer, which I apprehend is contained in the bill under consideration. The bill proposes to reduce the duties to the wants of the Government, and so to arrange these duties as to afford a fair and reasonable protection to those great interests which have grown up under the faith of the Government. These are my views, and, if accomplished, all will be well.

By a fair and reasonable protection, I do not mean prohibition, neither do I mean an insurance against the fluctuation of market by an excessive influx; but merely such protection as will counteract foreign regulations, and compensate for the difference in the cost of manufacturing. Is this not fair? Why should more be required, if protection alone is wanted, and when murmurs and discontents exist in the South? They say the operation is unequal; that one branch of industry is taxed to support another, and that they are compelled to pay more than their just proportion as to the equality of duties on the manufacturing and non-manufacturing States. I shall read an extract from the Federalist, a book of high authority: "When the demand is equal to the quantity of goods at market, the consumer generally pays the duty; but when the markets happen to be overstocked, a great proportion falls upon the merchant, and sometimes not only exhausts his profits, but breaks in upon his capital. I am apt to think that a division of the duty between the seller and the buyer more often happens than is commonly imagined. It is not always possible to raise the price of a commodity in exact proportion to every additional imposition laid upon it. The merchant, especially in a country of small commercial capital, is often under a necessity of keeping prices down, in order to a more expeditious sale. The maxim that the consumer is the payer, is so much oftener true than the reverse of the proposition, that it is far more equitable that the duties on imports should go into a common stock, than that they should redound to the exclusive benefit of the importing States. But is it not so generally true, as to render it equitable that these duties should form the only national fund? When they are paid by the merchant, they operate as an additional tax upon the importing States, whose citizens pay their proportion of them in their characters of consumers. In this view, they are productive of inequality among the States; which inequality would be increased with the increased extent of the duties. The confinement of the national revenues to this species of imports, would be attended with inequality from a different cause, between the manufacturing and non-manufacturing States. The States which can go farthest towards the supply of their own wants, by their own manufactures, will not, according to their numbers or wealth, consume so great a proportion of imported articles, as those States which are not in the same favorable situation; they could not, therefore, in this mode alone, contribute to the public treasury in a ratio to their abilities.

The Tariff.

Sir, I believe we have the power of protection, and I agree as to the expediency, at least so far as can be confined within the limits of a revenue standard.

The first great interest which I shall notice, requiring protection, is iron. This I place on a footing different from other manufactures. It is the first necessary of civilized life, "and contributes most to the wealth, the comfort, and the improvement of society." It is essential to the independence and defence of a nation. It is a great national object, in which we are all interested. I have no practical experience as to the making of iron; but from the best information I can obtain, I believe the protection proposed by this bill will be sufficient, and in a short time it may be reduced, if not dispensed with entirely. Our beds of ore and banks of coal are inexhaustible. A coking company is formed in this country, and when the application of stone coal is perfectly understood, we can make iron as cheap here as in any part of the world.

In England, in consequence of the encroachments on the forest in the year 1788, the quantity of iron made out of charcoal had dwindled down to thirteen thousand tons per annum. At that time coke was introduced into the blast furnaces, and in less than eight years it increased more than ten-fold; and, at this time, they make annually to the amount of eight hundred thousand tons, being more than all the world besides. The honorable gentleman from Connecticut, my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. INgersoll,] if I understood him correctly, seemed to insinuate that my course, in relation to this bill, was influenced by the favor shown to Pennsylvania on iron. Pennsylvania asks but equal justice; she claims no favor nor preference over her sister States. My colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD] thinks iron is not sufficiently protected, and can see no reason when we took the act of 1816, and its supplements of 1818, as the basis of our bill, that we did not put rolled iron at thirty dollars as it stood under the act of 1816. I say in reply, that I believe twenty-four dollars a sufficient protection for rolled iron, and is one step towards justice; the difference between hammered and rolled iron appeared unwarrantable; and even the justice of the discrimination may be doubted, if the expediency should not, as will be seen by the following letter.

[Here Mr. G. read a letter from Mr. Stratford Canning, Minister of Great Britain, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated Washington, November 26, 1812.]

I shall next proceed to the consideration of woollens, cottons, &c. The bill proposes a gradual reduction of duties on woollens and cottons to twenty per cent. It appears fully, by the testimony taken before the Committee on Manufactures, in 1828, as also by the returns to the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session, that woollens can be manufactured here as cheap as in England, provided the raw materials could be obtained on the same favorable terms. And why not? Have we not the best and latest improvements in machinery? Do not our manufacturers possess as much skill, industry, economy, and enterprise? We are no longer in our infancy. The duty on wool is reduced, and dye stuffs free; and besides, the foreign fabric will be subject to the additional charge of freight, insurance, commission, and exchange, equal at least to twenty per cent. more. Surely, with this protection, there can be no danger of the prostration of the existing establishments. We have nothing to fear from coarse cottons—they need no protection. We can manufacture them here as cheap as they can in England. We export the article, and compete with them in a foreign market. The only doubt is as to the finer cottons. I think, with the advances we have made in the manufacture of fine cottons, the protection afforded by this bill will answer. But I shall proceed to notice the testimony taken before the Committee on Manufactures, in 1828. The following question was proposed to several witnesses, to wit: If wool be the same price here as in England, can the American manufacturer make the fabric as cheap as it is made in England?

Abraham Marland says, I think we can manufacture wool in this country about as cheap as they can in England, wool being the same price.

Colonel James Shepherd says, the difference in the price of the fabric would be the difference in the price of the wool is my opinion, as I think we can manufacture it as cheap as they can.

William W. Young says, I think it can; I believe if I can have the raw material at the same price, I can manufacture cassimere as cheap as it can be done in England.

James Wolcott, Jr. says, we can do the mere labor of the manufacture as cheap as it is done in England.

Eleuterre Irenee Dupont says, the woollen manufacture is not yet fairly established in this country; but I know no reason why we cannot manufacture as well and as cheap as they can in England, except the difference in the price of labor, for which, in my opinion, we are fully compensated by other advantages. Our difficulties are not the cost of manufacturing, but the great fluctuations in our home market, caused by the excessive and irregular foreign importations. The high prices we pay for labor are, in my opinion, beneficial to the American manufacturer, as, for those wages, he gets a much better selection of hands, and those capable of, and willing to, perform a much greater amount of labor in a given time. The American manufacturer also uses a larger share of labor-saving machinery than is used in English manufactures, which very much diminishes the effect of the higher rate of wages upon the actual cost of our goods.

Joshua W. Pierce says, I think it can. All my information brings me to this conclusion, and one reason I would assign is, that we substitute a much larger share of the labor of females than they do in England, in the woollen manufacture.

Question. Were not manufactures, generally, doing a better business previous to 1824, than they have done since?

Abraham Marland says, I think the business previous to 1824 was better than it was in 1825 or 1826. My business certainly was.

James Wolcott, Jr. answers the same question. Our business has been worse since 1824, except in 1825, as woollen goods have fallen very much in price, say from 25 to 33½ per cent.

I shall next notice testimony in relation to the duty on wool, and the farming interest.

Question. Are you apprised of the fact that large quantities of wool is annually imported; and does not this tend to depreciate the price of the domestic wool?

The honorable Aaron Tufts, who was a wool-grower, and had about five hundred sheep, says, I am. I do not think this tends in the least to depreciate the price of domestic wool. The reason I assign for this opinion is, the manufacturer now pays so high a price for wool as to render the business unprofitable and bad, and, of consequence, if none was imported, we could pay no higher price.

James Shepherd, who was a wool-grower, and had from 1,200 to 1,400 sheep, answers the same question. I am aware that large quantities of foreign wool are imported. I consider the duty laid on foreign wool, by the act of 1824, as striking at the foundation of the manufacturing system. I am of opinion that, if the duty laid on foreign wool had not been more than one-half of what it was, wool growers and manufacturers would have both done better. I am of opinion, also, that the imported wool has no effect on the price of the domestic wool. I prefer the latter, whenever I can procure it, to any that is imported.

The following question was proposed to several witnesses:

Question. Is it, in your opinion, important to the farming interest of your State, to discourage the importation of foreign wool?

Honorable Aaron Tufts says, it is, in my opinion, of no consequence, unless you enable the manufacturer to furnish the farmer a market.

William W. Young says, I do not think it important to the farming interest of the State of Delaware, to discourage, at present, the importation of foreign wool, although it may be so in future.

Several witnesses answered the following:

Question. Has wool depreciated materially in price within the last three years? And, if so, to what is the depreciation to be attributed?

Abraham Marland says, it has depreciated in price, and the reason I would assign is, that the large importations of foreign woollen goods have reduced the prices of cloth, and disabled our manufacturers to pay a higher price for the article. We have always had as high priced a wool as we could afford.

Joshua W. Pearce answers the last question, and says, it has very considerably, I should say from 25 to 30 per cent. I attribute the depreciation to the over stock of foreign cloths in our markets, and to the consequent depressed prices of woollen cloths.

I have before me Document 1, No. 1, containing returns of the state of manufactures in Maine, made to the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session.

Asa Clapp says, cotton factories at the present time are very profitable; but it is to be expected, from the great number building, that much competition will ensue, and profits will be lessened. He further says, in the manufacture of wool we have made less advance; but it is thought a considerable reduction may take place, and the business still continue profitable.

James L. Child, from the same State, in Document 1, No. 2, says, the impression among intelligent gentlemen with whom I have conversed is, that the duties upon woollens and cottons might be advantageously reduced, and the factories still be able to carry on their business at a rate of profit considerably above what is realized in other branches.

Sir, I have examined returns from the States of Vermont and New York, and find the manufacturers generally to have large profits on their capital. I should next refer the committee to an extract of a letter on the manufacture of edge tools, in Chambersburgh, Pennsylvania. The letter is from Mr. Dunlap, one of the proprietors. He says: "We (Dunlap & Madeira) a few days ago received a letter from Messrs. Leasley & Meredith, hardware merchants in Philadelphia, stating, in substance, that they had just received a long letter from James Carr, of Sheffield, England, to whom they had forwarded, by order of his son, fifty dollars worth of our goods, as patterns, in which he says he is very much pleased with them, and that they are exceedingly neat and well finished, but that the price of them was too low, and that he cannot furnish such tools at that price, to suit any market in the United States. We sold him the goods at our retail price. He wishes to know your wholesale prices. The English workmen have great difficulty in hitting your patterns, and ask a considerable advance on any new article. We need not fear any competition with the English. American tools of the larger sort are from 10 to 20 per cent. better than the British any how."

Sir, I have no doubt considerable embarrassment will be the consequence of a reduction of the duties; it is always the case; but this is unavoidable. The national debt being paid off, the people will not submit to taxation or high duties, and suffer money to accumulate in the treasury. Bringing the protection to the revenue standard will give stability and uniformity to the system, and less protection will be required than where the system is shifting and changing. But it is apprehended that the proposed reduction would induce foreign manufacturers to glut the market at a present loss, with the hope of a future gain, by breaking down our establishments. This I consider without foundation, in consequence of the difficulty in dividing the loss among themselves.

The fact is, all the great branches of manufacture are already overdone. England alone could supply the world. The labor-saving machinery used there is equal to the labor of two hundred millions of people. The labor-saving machinery used here is perhaps equal to the labor of four times our present population. It is evident, then, that the production may easily exceed the consumption, because population cannot keep pace. But I shall not enlarge, nor detain the committee longer.

The committee then rose, on motion of Mr. McKEN-NAN, and the House adjourned.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his private secretary, communicating the nullifying ordinance of the South Carolina convention, and other papers relating thereto, together with the President's own views as to what was proper to be done in the existing posture of the Union in reference to that State. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WILDE said it was obvious that the message just read was universally felt to be of the most solemn importance. This might be seen in the anxious countenances which surrounded him. We had arrived at a solemn crisis—a crisis of the most extraordinary character. It had, for the first time since the institution of the Government, been announced to Congress by the Chief Magistrate of the United States, that one of the States of the Union had denied the power of our laws. If we persevere in enforcing these laws, she claims the right of withdrawing from the Union. This right she has announced that she will exercise, and will relieve her citizens from the operation of the laws of the United States, peaceably if she may, and with violence if that should become necessary. This was not the ordinary case of enforcing the execution of the laws upon private individuals.

South Carolina.

The SPEAKER said, if the gentleman proposed to make any motion, he would be pleased to submit his proposition in writing.

Mr. WILDE said his proposition was, that the message and the accompanying documents be printed; and that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow, in order that gentlemen might, after due reflection upon this momentous topic, come to its consideration with calmer feelings.

Mr. ARCHER inquired of the Chair whether the motion did not supersede a proposition for the reference of the message?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. ARCHER would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] whether it would not be better to withdraw his motion to postpone? He should not make any remarks upon that proposition.

Mr. WILDE regretted he was unable to comply with the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia. The reference, even of a subject like the present, required deliberation; the object of his motion was to gain time for deliberation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the motion to postpone would not prevail. If it is intended to pursue the course usually taken in such cases, the message should be referred. If the feelings of any gentleman was excited, the fact had not come to his knowledge. There was no occasion for inflaming the passions by precipitating ourselves into a debate upon this subject before it was referred and reported on by a committee in the ordinary course. The House had heard the opinion of the Executive, and for himself he was not prepared to act upon it until the measures recommended should be examined and reported on by one of the committees of the House. This examination would give members sufficient time to come to the discussion of the momentous subject with all the moderation which patriotism required.

Mr. WAYNE saw nothing in the message, or the documents accompanying it, which should excite. They were not unexpected, he believed, to any member of the House. The subject had been before the public for a considerable time. He regretted that he could not vote for the proposition of his colleague, accustomed as he ever had been, to follow his lead. The suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER], if followed out, he conceived to be the proper course. The proper reference of the message, in his view, was to a select committee, to be composed of one member from each State. Some of the subjects contained in the message were undoubtedly proper for the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary; but, as its leading principles were important to every State—

The SPEAKER said, any discussion upon the proper reference of the message was not now in order; the question before the House was upon its postponement.

Mr. WAYNE assented to the correctness of the decision. He trusted the motion to postpone would not meet with the concurrence of the House. It could only be supported in the view that we were to go into debate upon the subject, before it was referred. He could perceive no benefit from such a course. If it was first referred to a select committee; to report upon the proper course to be pursued, there would then be ample opportunity for discussion. He presumed that the House intended to provide for the effectual enforcement of the laws. There was no occasion for passion in discharging such a duty. He presumed that every member would bring to the discussion of such a subject the judgment and deliberation which it required. He therefore hoped an opportunity would be afforded for reporting such measures as would meet with the response of the whole House.

Mr. ARNOLD concurred in the views last expressed. There was nothing in the message to rouse passion—far from it; its tone was calculated to thrill with delight the bosom of every man that loved his country. It was a document which he desired to see in the hands of every man, woman, and child in the country; and, as he meant to move for printing an extra number of copies, he should oppose the postponement.

Mr. DEARBORN, in order to put a stop to premature and unnecessary discussion upon the motion, moved the previous question, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. WILDE, who said it had been suggested that it would be impossible to print the message and documents by to-morrow. He would, therefore, so modify his motion as to postpone to the day after to-morrow.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said the motion to postpone involved the single consideration whether it was expedient to go into the discussion of this subject before it had been examined by the committee. He could see no occasion for hurrying into a debate upon it before the subject had been reported on in the usual form. No benefit could be derived from thus rushing into the arena. He would submit to gentlemen whether it would not be better to avoid diving at once into deep water. He fully concurred with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WAYNE], who had suggested the reference to a select committee, to be composed of one member from each State.

Mr. STEWART differed from the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. ELLSWORTH.] In his opinion, the House should take two or three days to determine what would be the best course to pursue. According to his present view, the proper reference would be to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The time had arrived when this subject should be fully discussed, and the sentiments of the House upon it made known to the people. These documents should go forth to the nation with a full expression of the opinion of the House upon them. He should, therefore, vote in favor of the motion to postpone.

Mr. CARSON said he would vote in favor of the motion to postpone, for the single reason that he wished for time to consider which was the best course—not from any feeling or passion. He was not conscious of any; nor had he perceived any in other members. In the first instance, he had been ready to vote for a reference of the subject to the Judiciary Committee; but after the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WAYNE], inclined to the opinion that a select committee would be most appropriate. Before he came to a final conclusion, he wished for further time, and should, accordingly, vote in favor of the postponement.

Mr. E. EVERETT believed the original motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] was the most correct, and he regretted that it had been modified. All the papers, except the message of the President, had been before the public. The message itself would be in the hands of every gentleman in the morning; indeed, he would venture to say that it was now in type, and might be read within a few hours. All that was wanted was a little time for consideration. He would, therefore, move to amend the motion by striking out the day after to-morrow, and inserting to-morrow.

Mr. COULTELL was opposed both to the motion to postpone, and to the amendment. Neither proposed the course which had been usually given to the Executive messages—not only of the present, but of former Presidents. What had been the usual mode of disposing of the President's message? It was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. When it was so referred, it could be taken up at any time when the House was prepared for its consideration. After going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the proper direction to be given to each branch of the message could be considered. He was not inclined to cast off discussion on the subject. The doctrines of this message, in justice to the people, both as to the rights of the United States and of the States, should be fully discussed.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that the question before the House was simply upon the postponement.

Mr. COULTER said he was opposed to any postponement, and should support the reference of the message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McDUFFIE trusted the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] would prevail. It appeared to him that the object of the motion had been misconceived. He was not aware of any intention of going into a general discussion of the message at this time. As he understood the motion, it had been made for the purpose of giving gentlemen an opportunity of properly weighing the subject, and giving it such a course as seemed most proper. He must ask for the postponement, as matter of personal favor to himself. He had not heard the message read. He came into the hall after about two-thirds of it had been gone through. If a reference at this time was persisted in, he must ask that the message be again read for his information. For himself, he must confess his astonishment at witnessing so much apparent excitement, particularly among gentlemen who so strongly deprecate all excitement. He regarded the subject as too deep and solemn for excitement, in the ordinary acceptance of the term. Under the circumstances, he trusted the motion for postponement would prevail.

Mr. WILDE said, after the suggestion from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. EVERETT,] he would again modify his motion, and make it what it was originally—to postpone till to-morrow. Though the contents of the message might have been anticipated by some of the members of the House, he had not been made acquainted with them, and had no reason to expect it. The preparation to which his colleague [Mr. WAYNE] had alluded, had not been extended to him. He did not regard this as an unusual or disrespectful motion. On the other hand, he considered it most respectful to the Executive to consider deliberately what was the best course to be pursued. It might be most proper to refer the message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But on this point he had not formed an opinion, and was not prepared to commit himself.

Mr. WAYNE said, his only preparation as to the message, was an opinion in which he presumed he was not singular with regard to what was clearly the duty of the Executive under the circumstances. He would not deny but a rumour had come to him, within a day or two, that a message would be sent, and he was rejoiced that it had been received, as it would put an effectual stop to the calumnies that had been industriously circulated throughout the South that the President intended to resort to measures of coercion against South Carolina without consulting Congress.

Mr. DRAYTON would acknowledge that he felt an interest in this subject, and was anxious that it should be properly disposed of. He was not able to perceive any sufficient reason for the postponement. The message and documents could not be printed and laid on our tables by to-morrow. The object of this communication was to enable Congress to devise the proper means for calming the tempest which now lowered over a part of the Union. The sooner we proceeded to this duty, the sooner the horizon would be cleared. The best course appeared to him to be to refer to a committee the consideration of the laws which now exist, together with the amendments which may be necessary. Upon their report the House would be able to form a competent opinion of the measures necessary to be taken under the trying circumstances in which we were placed. If the subject was now referred, this plan would soon be laid before the House.

If it was postponed till to-morrow, another day would probably be spent in general discussion; and there was no reason for supposing that it would then be disposed of. The House would not then be calmer than it now is. The subject was but too familiar; it had been long before the public. Whatever duties the members of the House owed to themselves and their country, they were probably as ready to discharge at this, as at any other time. Thinking, as he did, that the sooner the system of measures was settled the better, he felt bound to oppose the motion for a postponement.

Mr. WILLIAMS could see no reason for delay, which would not apply with as much force to-morrow as to-day. The House was now as well prepared to decide upon the proper course as it could be then. He should, therefore, vote against the postponement.

Mr. ARCHER was as willing, and perhaps as desirous, to express his views at length upon this great subject as any member in the House; but he could not act with precipitation in such a crisis. He was not one of those who could find matter for excitement in such an occasion. In his opinion, the message that had been read was as much calculated to allay excitement, as any that had been ever promulgated. When he had endeavored to get the floor immediately after the message was read, it was not for the purpose of moving its reference to a select committee, of which, by the courtesy of the House, he would have been chairman. As a southern man, he had no wish to be placed in that situation. His object was to move its reference to one of the standing committees of the House. At a proper time he should move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS considered the reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the proper reference. He should make that motion.

Mr. HOFFMAN could not perceive any benefit to be gained by a postponement. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] had not heard the message, and now wishes it to be again read, he should cheerfully accord the privilege to him. But as to further delay, it should be remembered that half the period of the session had been spent, and little business had been done. If the subject is postponed, we stand to-morrow precisely where we do to-day. It had been stated to be the ordinary course to refer messages to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Why may not that course be as well taken to-day as to-morrow? It was the imperative duty of the House to make the earliest possible disposition of the subject. He would not defeat his own object, which was to dissuade debate on this question at this stage, by taking up more time. He hoped the message would be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in which every gentleman who desired, might fully state his opinions.

Mr. INGERSOLL said he should vote against the motion to postpone. He could not agree to a reference to a standing committee, or the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Why should it go into Committee of the Whole unless for the purpose of getting up a discursive debate. Whenever the subject was brought before the House it should be upon some distinct proposition.

The SPEAKER said the discussion of reference was not now in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL said he would not pursue it further than to remark, that he thought a reference to a select committee composed of one member from each State was the most appropriate reference.

Mr. BURGESS said the word of excitement had a two fold meaning; it might import a sober, anxious solicitude upon a subject of vital interest; or it might mean a violent blaze of feeling. He is willing to admit that he was under the influence of excitement of the former kind, and well he might when a subject of such engrossing importance was before the House. Every member in the hall, was, he hoped, prepared to consider it calmly and deliberately. His opinion as to the reference of this message was that it should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. He, therefore, should not have voted for the postponement were it not that the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE] who had not heard the message, asked it as a personal gratification to himself. Situated as that gentleman is with regard to this subject, he could not refuse his request.

Mr. CRAIG thought as the subject would be entirely in the power of the House, when referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, he should vote against the postponement. If gentlemen were not ready to take up the subject, and could satisfy the committee that it ought not to be taken up, it would not be done. He could perceive no reason for the postponement.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON had listened with attention to the remarks that had been made in favor of postponement, and had been convinced that it would only lead to a premature and useless discussion upon the subject generally, instead of a profitable debate upon definite measures. There was other important business before the House, and he was unwilling to see too much precious time wasted. He thought it the duty of the House to refer the message to some committee who would make a speedy report upon it. If it was sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it would only give rise to an interminable discussion. He should, therefore, vote against the postponement, and in favor of the reference to a committee who would report the measures necessary to be adopted.

Mr. WILDE said, if the gentleman from Kentucky supposed the motion to postpone had been made from any wish for an opportunity to go into a discussion of the subject at the present stage, he was entirely mistaken. His object was to avoid, if possible, all debate upon it, until the opinions of the House upon the great subject which he had most at heart, should be ascertained; though at this time, he must admit the auspices in relation to that subject, appeared very threatening.

After some remarks by Mr. WATMOUGH,

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered: Yeas 86, nays 104.

So the motion to postpone was negatived.

Mr. ARCHER moved to refer the message and documents to the Committee on the Judiciary. The object of the message was to bring to the attention of Congress the necessity for certain laws. If Congress concurred in the views stated, he would put it to the House whether the Judiciary Committee was not the most proper to examine and report upon the subject. He had been surprised at the proposition to refer the message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Was that committee competent to digest and prepare the necessary measures? By such a reference every object of reference would be prostrated. The subject would be turned loose upon the wide field of debate only for the purpose of creating excitement. All that was suggested in the message as necessary, was certain additions and amendments to the revenue laws. For the purpose of reporting these additions and amendments, the Judiciary Committee was the most proper. It was not, perhaps, very important whether the reference was to a standing or select committee. Either would fully and speedily accomplish the object desired. But he hoped the reference would not be made to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless gentlemen desired to go into a protracted debate without practical result.

Mr. STEWART regarded the subject as one of the utmost consequence to every State in the Union. He therefore moved its reference to a select committee of 24—one from each State.

Mr. SPEIGHT would vote for the reference to the Judiciary Committee. He did not propose going into a discussion, but would only inquire as to the object in view? It was simply the amendment of the revenue laws. Why should such a subject be referred to a select committee of 24 members. They would assemble day after day, and the House would not probably get the report of such a committee for a long time. The Judiciary Committee, on the other hand, were familiar with such subjects, and would undoubtedly make a speedy report.

Mr. IRWIN said, the standing committees were selected in reference to the duties they were ordinarily called on to perform. He would ask if this was an ordinary subject? It was one of the very highest magnitude, and should be sent to a committee raised with express reference to it, instead of being sent to one of the standing committees. He should therefore vote against its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He had heard nothing that had altered his original opinion, as to the propriety of this reference. There were several subjects involved in the message which might be properly referred to different standing committees, which rendered it most proper to be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in the first instance, in the same manner as the annual messages. It could be then properly dissected and distributed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG begged gentlemen to reflect that if the message was sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, probably three weeks would be spent in debate upon it. All that was desired, was that a committee should report the necessary amendments to the present laws relative to the collection of the revenue. The whole subject was of a judicial nature. One great object was to obviate the replevin law of South Carolina, and provide for enforcing the laws of the United States. In his opinion, no course was so proper to effect this object, as the proposed reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COULTER did not feel much anxiety as to the reference of the message, but having before suggested the propriety of referring it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, he would beg leave to state one or two of the reasons for that course. He did not regard the present as an ordinary message, proper to be referred to an ordinary committee. Matters are discussed in it which go to the very foundation of Government. It expounds the rights of individuals of the several States of the Union. For what purpose was the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union established? In order that the situation of the Union might be periodically discussed at large, without being trammelled by the rules of the House. In the days of his youth, he recollected it was common for Congress to go into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, for the purpose of discussing the general condition of the public affairs. Why were the relations between the States and the General Government stated in the message except for the purpose of discussion? It was true there was an isolated case respecting the revenue laws, contained in it; but should we narrow our deliberations down to that point? It was due to ourselves, to South Carolina, and to the United States, that the whole subject should be fully discussed. After a proper discussion of principles, it would not take any select or standing committee long to embody them into a bill or bills. He was not willing to pursue any course which was calculated to stifle discussion, or avoid debate.

Mr. BELL said, the practical question appeared to be whether the House preferred that the general discussion should take place before or after the report of a committee. If the message was now referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, the general principles would be first debated, and then sent to a committee to digest and report the proper measures to be taken. If, on the other hand, the message was now referred to a special or standing committee, the report would be made before the general discussion would take place. The matter under consideration, therefore, resolved itself into the question whether the general debate should be precedent, or subsequent, to a report of a definite character. Whether the reference was to a Standing or select committee was to him a matter of comparative indifference.

Mr. DRAYTON felt compelled to oppose the reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the reason that it would occasion the loss of much time, when time was of the greatest importance. If the reference is made to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the subject must afterwards be sent to a standing or select committee. Such a committee would be able to exercise their sound and impartial judgment with more calmness now than in the midst of a stormy debate. Gentlemen had disclaimed the influence of excitement. Whenever specific measures should be proposed, he had no doubt but a scene of excitement would be seen such as had never been before witnessed in Congress. If excitement could not be avoided, it should at least come at a time when it would preclude the adoption of necessary measures. It had been said that means were necessary to obviate the operation of the replevin laws. He regarded such as altogether minor matters. The great subject submitted to Congress and to the people was, to devise means to prevent collisions between the powers of a sovereign State, and the General Government; to settle whether a State shall prescribe what laws shall be executed within its territory, or whether the General Government shall carry its laws into execution. No question was so important as this. It should be submitted to the attention of a committee who were not harassed by other business. All the objection he had to the Judiciary Committee was, that they had other matters before them, while this was a subject of such primary importance as to demand the undivided attention of the committee to which it should be sent. He was, therefore, in favor of sending the message to such a select committee as would inspire confidence in their report, both in the House and the people.

The question was then put on referring the message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was lost without a count.

The reference was then made to the Judiciary Committee by a large majority of the House.

Mr. CLAY moved the message and documents be printed.

Mr. ARNOLD moved, by unanimous consent, that an additional number of twenty thousand copies be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend the motion, by striking out "twenty" and inserting twenty-five.

Mr. ARNOLD accepted the amendment as a modification of his motion, and twenty-five thousand copies were ordered.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17.

THE TARIFF—MANUFACTURES, &c.

The following resolutions, laid on the table yesterday by Mr. ADAMS, coming up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House a list of articles upon which the reduction of six millions may, for the most part, be made upon those denominated protected articles, without prejudice to the reasonable claims of existing establishments.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a list of articles of domestic manufacture, which are indispensable to our safety in time of war, and to which it is stated in the message of the President to Congress, that the policy of protection must ultimately be limited.

Mr. ADAMS, in illustration of the first of these resolutions, quoted the message of the President, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the resolutions refer. He observed that the message took for granted, that there were particular interests in this country, the protection of which exceeded that which was necessary in order to counteract the legislation of foreign nations. This was assumed; and it was also assumed that the diminution of the existing protection was the policy which it was the duty of Congress to pursue. Now, the reduction of the revenue was one thing, and the reduction of protection was another; the former might be effected without the other; and it was the desire of a large part of the American people, that, in reducing the amount of revenue, the protection of our domestic industry should remain untouched. Such, however, had been the recommendation of the President; and it was followed by an argument as to the degree of protection which was due to manufacturers, in which the principle was assumed that the protection of those manufacturers was, in its very nature, temporary; that it was accorded as a favor, and was intended to continue only until they should be permanently established; and the President came at length to the conclusion, that the protective policy of this country must ultimately be limited to articles of indispensable necessity, and necessary for our independence in time of war. This principle was, in its character, revolutionary; it differed from every thing that had ever been heard before; and if the House should adopt it, and, in compliance with it, proceed to the reduction, not of revenue, but of protection, and terminate with the total withdrawal of all protection whatever, save to articles of the description mentioned, then it was of extreme importance to the House to know what those articles were which were of indispensable use, and necessary to the independence of the nation in time of war.

The other resolution had reference to the report of the Secretary of War. The two resolutions were much connected, although one of the resolutions referred to the message, and the other to the report. [Here Mr. A. quoted the report of the Secretary.] There was some little difference between the views of the President and those of his officer, so far as they had a practical bearing. The Secretary seemed not to be prepared to abandon totally all protection whatever; the tenor of his argument, on the contrary, seemed to indicate that he was in favor of sustaining it as far as practicable. He seemed to admit that the interest of the nation required a permanent protection against the legislation of foreign nations, and that it was not to be gradually withdrawn until it should be totally done away.

The Secretary thought the revenue might be reduced six millions of dollars, without prejudice to the reasonable claims of existing establishments. It was of extreme importance to the House to possess the information how this might be done. If it was indeed possible that a tariff could be formed on the principles stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, all the difficulties under which the country labored was at once solved. They need hear no more of nullification; they need listen to no more such messages as had been read yesterday; they would hear nothing more of proclamations and counter-proclamations; all would be peace and harmony. But, really, without further information from the Secretary, Mr. A., for one, was totally ignorant how it was possible to reduce the revenue six millions without prejudice to the just claims of existing establishments. The bill now before the committee did not even profess to do any such thing. It did, indeed, profess to reduce the revenue six millions of dollars, but it was very far from doing so "without prejudice to the just claims of existing establishments." So far from it, that the committee had been driven to introduce a clause into the bill to increase the imposts. Indeed, the title of the bill should have been—"A bill to reduce and to increase the duties on imported articles." And it was extremely doubtful whether the bill would, in fact, reduce the revenue at all. But the effect of the reduction proposed would have an effect very different from that referred to by the Secretary. Instead of not working any prejudice to existing establishments, it wrought their utter ruin and destruction. Mr. A., for one, wanted to know what these articles were; and he wanted also to learn what those articles were, which, being in the view of the President essential to our independence in time of war, and which alone were ultimately to be exempt from having all protection totally and forever withdrawn.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN said he had given some consideration to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, though he believed they had both been strangers to the House until the day before; and he was convinced that if they were viewed as to their practical tendency, they could not possibly do any good, and might, by possibility, work considerable mischief, certainly the mischief of unnecessary delay.

The first resolution called upon the Secretary of the treasury, not for a scheme of all those articles on which it was desirable that the reduction of revenue should be made, but only those on which protection might be diminished without prejudice to the just claims of existing establishments. Now, if the Secretary should reply to this call directly, what would probably be his answer? Perhaps he would say that those articles were wool, woollens, cotton, iron, iron manufactures, spirits, salt, sugar, and a few others.

He would give this list, without specifying any duty which he recommended to be imposed upon each; for the gentleman took care not to call the Secretary's views as to the system collectively. Now what use would such an enumeration of articles avail for any purpose of legislation by that House? It would amount to nothing more than an enumeration of what were commonly denominated "protected articles." Was there any man in that House who did not know what these articles were? Was there any who could not, in a few minutes, make a list of them all? A direct, unequivocal answer to this call would, therefore, be utterly useless; it might, perhaps, furnish a peg to hang a speech upon, and might possibly supply some ground on which to rest a complaint against the Secretary; but how would it aid the House in deciding upon the best mode of laying the taxes so as to render them as equal and as little oppressive as might be practicable? To this end it could be of no use whatever.

But if, contrary to the true intent of the resolutions on the face of them, it was intended to ask the Secretary for a plan or a bill which should cover the whole ground, then he asked the House to look at the effect that must follow. The resolution, in this sense, asked for the opinion of the Secretary, not for facts in his possession; and was it usual for that House to ask the opinion of one of the departments on great and complicated questions? And if it had, was it common in the House, after it was already deeply engaged in the discussion of a subject, to arrest the course of the debate, and apply to a Secretary for his personal opinions? Mr. H. thought not; he thought that it was for that House to rejudge the judgment of every department. As to the facts on which the Secretary founded his opinions, they must be such as were in possession of the members of that House generally, or such as he had selected in answer to a call of the House. Now, as to general information, the Secretary's opportunities to acquire it might be, and doubtless were, better than those of any particular member of the House; but that this officer alone possessed a larger aggregate amount of knowledge than belonged to the whole House, collectively, was what he could not subscribe to. Highly as he regarded the opinions of the Secretary, he could not believe that they ought to outweigh the judgment of the whole House of Representatives. He was willing to take the Secretary's views in aid of his own, but he did not consider it respectful or dignified for the House to go to him for his opinions. But, as to the other facts to which he had referred, they were no longer in the Secretary's possession, but had by him been transmitted to the House.

But, being aware of the very great solicitude of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he had felt it his duty to make personal inquiry of the Secretary as to his opinions and views on the subject of the resolution, and he was authorized by that gentleman to say that he had given to the bill now pending so much consideration as his public duties would permit, and that, in his judgment, the bill, as it came from the Committee of Ways and Means, would furnish to all existing establishments such adequate protection as he supposed them to deserve; and if the Secretary's opinion was the object sought by the resolution, he hoped that this reply would be satisfactory.

At this point of the discussion Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, called for the Orders of the Day, and the House thereupon went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WARREN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. McKENNAN, of Pennsylvania, having the floor, rose and said, he felt that it was no enviable task to enter upon the discussion of a subject, which had already occupied so much of the attention of the House at the last and present session of Congress, and which might be considered as almost entirely exhausted, in all its bearings, and in all its arguments. Nothing (said Mr. McK.) would induce me to throw myself upon the indulgence of the committee, but a consideration of the immense magnitude of the question to be determined, and the all-important influence, either for good or for evil, which its decision will have upon the interests of my constituents, of my State, and of my country.

Sir, if there be any one subject upon which there has been a perfect union of views and of action, among the people of the State from which I come, it is on that of the protective policy. In their private circles, in their primary assemblies, in their legislative bodies, and in their Executive messages, the people and their Representatives have held one uniform language, and that is—"protect the industry of our own country; encourage the laborer, the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer of our own country, in preference to the laborers, the farmers, the mechanics, and the manufacturers of other countries." Whatever may have been our political differences and our political preferences, men of all parties have fought unitedly and manfully in support of this system. I cannot, therefore, sir, sit by in silence, and witness the prostration of a system which is interwoven with the best interests of my State, and which has raised this nation to an elevation of strength and independence, of wealth and prosperity, which has been a source of pride and exultation to our citizens, and has extorted the admiration of the world. Against the overthrow of this system I feel constrained by an imperious sense of duty to raise my voice, under the hope that an effort, however humble, may do something to stay the arm of the destroyer, and to arrest the impending calamity. This, then, will be my apology for troubling the committee at this time, and I pledge myself that I will not trespass long upon their patience.

Sir, the protective policy has been recognized as the true policy of the country ever since the foundation of the Government. Almost the first act of Congress, which was passed after the adoption of the constitution, was entitled, in part, "An act for the protection and encouragement of manufactures."

The essential importance of this policy to the wealth and independence of the nation early attracted the attention of the father of his country, who was always alive to every thing which was calculated to promote its best interests; and who, in his Executive messages, pressed upon Congress the promotion and encouragement of it, with all the solicitude he felt for the future glory and prosperity of that country. In this his efforts have been seconded by all the distinguished men who have since filled the Executive chair down to the present period; each and all of whom have, in some form or other, advocated and maintained, encouraged and enforced it, as the only true policy.

It is not my intention to fatigue the committee with a recital of the authorities (which are abundant) to support this position. They have already been arranged and brought before the House in so handsome a manner by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Barre,] who, a few days since, so eloquently addressed us, that it would be an unnecessary waste of time for me to be repeating what he has so much better said than I could expect to do. I will not do it.

But, sir, lamentable, dear bought experience during the last war, demonstrated the necessity, if we would not be dependent upon our very enemies for the munitions of war, and even the clothes of our soldiers, of bringing our workshops from Europe, and of aiding American enterprise in every branch of labor, so as to enable our own citizens to raise and manufacture within themselves all the necessities of domestic consumption. This demonstration led to the passage of the law of 1816, which was enacted as well for protection as for revenue. As a measure of protection to home industry, it was urged upon Congress with all the zeal, and eloquence, and ability, which its advocates could command. Among these advocates, sir, were to be found some of the most talented and patriotic Representatives of that very State which now threatens to dissolve the Union, because a large majority of the people will not consent to the sacrifice of a system which was fixed upon them in part by their influence and exertions, and which they believe has promoted the best interests of the country. And among those talented sons of South Carolina, none more ably or more successfully advocated this principle of protection, than an honorable gentleman who now holds a distinguished rank in the councils of the nation, and who will hold a conspicuous place in the pages of the future history of his country. And let it be borne in mind, sir, that this system was fixed upon the nation by the votes of the Southern and Middle States, against the views, the appeals, and the remonstrances, of our brethren of the East, who were then engaged, profitably and extensively engaged, in the pursuits of navigation and commerce. Those pursuits they were compelled for a time to abandon; but such is the elasticity, activity, and enterprise, of that people, that they soon directed their capital and industry into the channel pointed out by the legislation of their country; and with what success they have applied their energies is attested by the unequivocal evidence which their flourishing villages, their highly cultivated farms, and their busy factories and workshops exhibit, of their unexampled growth and prosperity.

Eight years of actual experiment satisfied the people, and their Representatives, that the protection afforded our manufacturers by the law of 1816, was insufficient to enable them successfully to compete with foreign capital and skill, and with the pauper labor of Europe, and determined them to carry out the principle of that law, by giving to the labor and enterprise of our citizens, efficiency, ample encouragement, and protection. This determination produced the enactment of the laws of 1824 and 1828, which did afford to our farmers, mechanics, and manufacturers, all necessary protection and encouragement. Believing, then, the policy of the Government to be settled, fixed, and permanent, as evidenced by these various acts of legislation, hundreds, yes, thousands of millions of dollars have been vested by the people in the establishment of manufactories, and in the growth and culture of the raw material consumed in them throughout the country—the whole of which, there is too much reason to fear, will be sacrificed, if the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, now under discussion, shall be adopted by Congress.

And now, Mr. Chairman, permit me briefly to inquire what have been the practical operation and effect of this system upon the interests and upon the prosperity of the country? Commerce, contrary to the anticipations of its enemies, has flourished—the mechanic arts have been encouraged—the laborer has experienced a greater demand and higher wages for his labor—the farmer has been secured a steadier and a better market for his produce—the planter of the Southern States has prospered—the manufacturer has prospered—the whole country, and all its parts have prospered, not excepting the very State which is now so loudly and so boldly presenting its complaints; whose flourishing condition is exhibited in the most glowing colours in the last annual message of her Executive; and besides all this, sir, under the operation of this very system, will shortly be exhibited to the world the extraordinary and astonishing spectacle of a nation of better than twelve millions of people, free of debt.

Sir, a system which has been fraught with so many benefits and blessings to the nation, ought to be touched with care, with delicacy, and with caution! Whilst the extinguishment of the public debt will be hailed by our citizens as an era of exultation, and of mutual congratulation, it is apparent that its approach will not be unattended with its difficulties, embarrassments, and dangers. It is conceded, that when that era does arrive, there must be some modification or alteration and reduction of the duties heretofore imposed upon imports, in order to prevent the accumulation of a surplus revenue in the treasury, above the amount necessary to discharge all the expenditures of the Government; and how this is to be done, without endangering great and important interests, is a question of no ordinary difficulty. In anticipation of this event, a bill for the reduction of the duties was passed at the last session of this Congress. At least four months were occupied in preparing, maturing, and discussing the merits and the provisions of that bill. In it great and important concessions were made to our brethren of the South. The minimum system which has latterly become so obnoxious to them, was abolished. "Those articles principally necessary for the maintenance and clothing of the laborers of the South and Southwest, were, to a certain degree, relieved; and, both by its direct enactments, and as incident to its main scope, it encouraged and increased consumption of such articles as depended for their fabrication upon the raw materials and productions of the South." It is now before the people as a matter of experiment. The time proposed for its going into operation has not yet arrived. What will be its effect upon the revenue, and (what I consider of greater importance) what will be its operation upon the industry of the country, cannot be known or ascertained. No experience of the past can enable us to determine, and no man, unless he possesses the spirit of prophecy, can tell.

With this law, then, on our statute book, as yet inoperative, why are we now driven with an urgency which will not admit of a month's, a week's, an hour's delay, into the passage of another bill of reduction, which, with all due deference to the committee who reported it, may, in my view, be better denominated a bill for the prostration of domestic industry. Where is the imperious demand for this precipitancy in the passage of a bill, which involves in it the most vitally important interests of the country? Have we heard a voice, sir, from home—from our constituents—thundering in our ears, and demanding the immediate reversal of the act which we did, with so much deliberation, not six months ago. Where is it? Has any one heard it? Yes, my honorable colleague from the Pittsburgh, district has heard one, the size and volume of which I shall hereafter notice. But, I put it to gentlemen, have the people expected this movement of haste? Did they ever dream that the subject would be touched at this short session of Congress, and too, to the exclusion of all the other business of importance on our calendar? I can speak for myself, and do not hesitate to say that, among the community generally, no such expectation was entertained. Many millions of the people have not yet had time to know the nature and provisions of the bill under discussion, or that the question is now again agitating on this floor. We can find no excuse then, sir, for this precipitate action, in the wishes or instructions of our constituents.

But, perhaps, sir, some excuse may be found in the fact of the present overflowing state of your treasury—that this so much dreaded surplus is already there, and that the distinguished head of that department has recommended and urged upon Congress an immediate reduction, according to the views presented by the committee. Let us briefly examine into this, and learn what the Secretary says on the subject. In the seventh page of the Treasury Report, he uses this language: "Still firmly convinced of the truth of the reasons then presented, for a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, I am again urged, by a sense of duty, to suggest that a further reduction of six millions of dollars be made, to take effect after the year 1833. Whether that shall consist altogether of a diminution of the duties on imports, or partly of a relinquishment of the public lands as a source of revenue as suggested, it will be for the wisdom of Congress to determine." Again, in page 10 of the report, he says: "By these considerations, and the proud and gratifying fact, that there no longer exists any public debt, requiring the present amounts of revenue after the ensuing year," &c.

Thus you perceive, sir, that the head of the financial department asks not, and recommends not, any immediate reduction. But let us see what the committee have said on the subject. In the second page of their report, they use this language: "This excess, in the opinion of the committee, should be reduced by the present Congress, and at the present time;" and, in accordance with this view, their bill contemplates a reduction after the 3d of March next. Your Secretary advises no reduction till after the present year—they say now is the time, and the only time for action. Your Secretary asks us to give him the means of paying off the seven millions of outstanding debt. They say that debt is already paid, or, what amounts to the same thing, they assume that it is extinguished by the stock held by the Government in the Bank of the United States; and now let me ask, sir, where do they find any authority for such an assumption? Has any act been passed by Congress, directing this stock, which yields the Government seven per cent. dividends, to be thrown into market, and sold at a sacrifice, as in all probability it must be, from the overstocking of the market, in order to discharge a debt, drawing from the treasury an interest of only four and a half, and five per cent.? Has there been any movement in Congress towards a measure of this kind? There has been none, and I hope there will not be. That stock will unquestionably be equal to par, at least, if the bank is permitted to wind up its business in peace, and without any unnecessary embarrassment thrown upon its operations by the Government. Whereas if six millions of stock should now be thrown into market, it must create a panic among capitalists, and no man can tell what it will command. To my mind this would be the most unwise, imprudent policy in the world, and I hope it will not be adopted.

But, again, in forming the basis of their calculation, the committee have embraced the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, as part of the permanent revenue. Now, sir, can we close our eyes to the fact, that, at the last session of Congress, a bill passed the other House, and that its consideration in this was postponed, by a very small majority, for the distribution of the annual proceeds of the public domain among the different States, according to their population, to be applied to the purposes of education, internal improvement, and colonization, and to the payment of debts contracted for any of those objects. Are we not aware, that that bill is again before the Senate, and may possibly now be on its passage? Are we not aware, too, sir, that the recommendation has come from high authority, to reduce the price of those lands to a point barely sufficient to raise enough from the sale to defray the expenses of the land system, and, after some time, to give them away to the new States within whose limits they lie? Can we doubt, sir, from the indications we have had, that some disposition will be made of those lands, by which their proceeds will be withdrawn from the treasury? And if so, how can the committee—how can we be justified in founding a permanent system of revenue on any such basis? Take away this item in the calculation of the committee, and you deprive them of two millions and a half of the revenue, which must be made up in some other way. And, whilst on this subject, let me call the attention of the committee of the House to the fact, that in giving the estimated expenditures of the Government, in one single item, they have made a mistake of at least half a million of dollars. I allude, sir, to the sum which will be necessary, annually, to discharge the debt of gratitude and of justice to the soldiers of the revolution, which was authorized and directed by the act of the last session. Their estimate is, that no more than one million of dollars will be required for this purpose. This is merely conjectural; and since their report was made, a document has been laid upon our tables from the War Department, which proves that, in all probability, one million five hundred thousand dollars will be required for that purpose, in addition to the million of dollars which are required to discharge the accruing pensions, under former laws.

But I will not pursue this subject any further. The report upon the finances, by the Secretary, exhibits no surplus in the treasury at this time. Take from it the amount of ineffective funds, consisting of worthless paper received many years since, when the Government was under the necessity of transacting its business through the medium of the broken State banks, and the amount of funds received from foreign nations, as an indemnity for spoliation upon the property of our citizens, which belongs to them, and not to the Government, and there is now an actual deficiency. If the proceeds of sale of the public lands should be withdrawn from the treasury, either by distributing them among all the States, according to the views of some, or by reducing their price, and finally giving them away to the new States, as is urged by others, there is no probability of this surplus accumulating in the treasury for years yet to come; at all events not until after the actual relinquishment of the public debt.

But again, sir, let me ask what imperious necessity demands a present, immediate, precipitate reduction as recommended by the committee? And let me answer this inquiry by proposing another. Have the committee taken counsel of their fears? On this subject I mean to offer no disrespect to the committee, or any member of it, or to any member of this House, but I intend to speak the language of a freeman, and of the Representative of freemen.

What, then, is the state of the facts which have probably dictated this movement? They have been officially announced to us in the message of the President, and are spread before the people; we cannot close our eyes upon them. A single State of this Union has raised her puny arm against the power of the Government. I use this term, sir, not with any view of disparagement or insult to the State which has thought proper to place herself in this attitude. But the arm of any single State, of any six single States, is puny and powerless, when raised against a Government founded upon the affections of the people, and which has strength enough to crush into nothingness any forcible opposition to the enforcement of its laws, from whatever quarter, or from whatever persons, it may proceed.

South Carolina has placed herself in an attitude of hostility against the Government. She has pronounced your laws unconstitutional, void, no law, and has declared that they shall not be enforced within her limits. Is this the time, then, sir, for deliberation, for cool, deliberate, dispassionate discussion of a subject involving the permanent change of a system which has raised the country to a point of unexampled prosperity, and which, in its overthrow, may involve millions in ruin and wretchedness? Can it be expected that we will be driven by the menaces of South Carolina, to recede from the ground we have taken, to abandon the policy, and the very principle of protection to American enterprise and American labor? For she has proclaimed to the world that she will be satisfied with nothing less than a total, absolute, unqualified abandonment of the principle. Sir, she asks too much, and I, for one, am prepared to say that I cannot, will not, grant it. The bill upon your table, sir, destructive as I consider it to be to the interests of the Northern, Middle, and Western States, would not satisfy her, for it asserts, in form, at least, the principle of protection.

I hope with all my heart, sir, although I confess, from present indications, it seems to be hoping against hope, that she may recede from the fatal ground she has assumed. The universal voice of condemnation which has been heard from one extreme of the Union to the other, from each and all of her sister States, ought to satisfy her that she has gone too far. But, sir, if she refuses this advice, and will persist in her career of madness, we must meet the crisis, and meet it like men, with forbearance, but with firmness. In the humble part which I have to act, I shall endeavor, fearlessly and firmly, to discharge my duty to my conscience, my constituents, and my country, and leave the consequences to that superintending Providence, who, I hope and trust, will deliver us in this time of difficulty, of distress, and of danger.

But, sir, I dismiss this part of the subject; neither the voice of our constituents, nor the state of the treasury, demands action at this time; and the state of the country, and a regard for the future peace, safety, and permanency of the Government seem to forbid it.

Before entering upon an examination of the features of the bill, let me notice the remarks submitted by my colleague, who is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and who joined with the majority in reporting it to the House. Let it be remembered, that he is the first member of the committee, (with the exception of the general remarks made by the chairman when the bill was brought up,) or of the advocates of the bill, who has broken the silence of death, which, for some cause or other, has sealed their lips. I am glad he has done it. His constituents and the country would, I am sure, expect some explanation of the reasons, no doubt satisfactory to himself, which have dictated the course he has adopted.

My honorable colleague, sir, represents one of the greatest manufacturing districts in the United States; a city which is the Birmingham of America, whose very life and prosperity depend upon the continuance of the policy of encouragement to home industry, and whose wants and demands contributed more to the establishment of the high tariff of 1828, than the wants and demands of any other section of the country. He, too, has, heretofore, fought shoulder to shoulder with the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. INGHAM], on the Committee of Ways and Means, in support of the system, and no longer since than last year, joined that gentleman in presenting to this House one of the most lucid, masterly, and eloquent refutations of the anti-tariff doctrines, which I have ever seen or read. But he has now changed his views and course, and what are the reasons assigned for this change? In answer to an inquiry propounded by me, he says he has received instructions from his constituents on the subject: and what are these instructions? He has received letters from his friends; how many he has not told us, advising him to moderation and concession, and to save the Union; but do these letters recommend this moderation and concession at the sacrifice of the interests and wealth of the great majority of the people of this Union? And, if so, can my honorable friend undertake to say that they speak the language of the majority of his district? That district, sir, consists, I think, of three large counties, and must contain nearly one hundred thousand inhabitants. There are thousands, yes, tens of thousands of those very constituents, who have not had time to learn that the subject is now again agitating before Congress, or what are the features and provisions of the bill under discussion.

Again, sir, my honorable colleague avows himself in favor of the constitutionality and the expediency of the protective policy; but expresses the opinion that all the great manufacturing interests are sufficiently protected by this bill; and upon what evidence is this opinion founded? To prove the fact that the article of iron has sufficient protection, he has resorted to a letter written—by whom? by one of the intelligent, experienced, and respectable manufacturers of our own country? No, but by the British minister, who complains of the unfavorable operation of the discriminating duties, not upon our labor, but upon the manufacturers and dealers of his own country, and who would rejoice in the ruin and destruction of every manufacturing establishment in the United States. Is this the kind of testimony which is to be laid before an American Congress, to satisfy them of the nature and amount of protection which ought to be given to our own citizens.

But, again, in order to show that the woollens and cottons are sufficiently protected, he has read extracts from the testimony of several witnesses, taken before the Committee on Manufactures, in 1828, previous to the passage of the law of that year. What was the character and standing of the witness who thus deposed, I have no means of ascertaining; one of them, it is certain, failed within six months after his examination, to the amount of about one hundred thousand dollars; and how many more of them were bankrupts I cannot tell. But, sir, there is one thing certain, and this alone is a sufficient answer to my colleague's allegation, that this very evidence, with a mass of other testimony, was before Congress in 1828, who, from the whole weight of the testimony, were perfectly satisfied that the protection to those interests was totally insufficient, and who, with a view of giving adequate protection, passed the law of that year.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

But, sir, my honorable friend indulges in the cry raised by the enemies of the system of "taxation burdens upon the people; that, after the payment of the public debt, they will not submit to those burdens," &c. &c. The gentleman comes from the same region of country with myself, and he will permit me to propound to him a few plain, simple questions upon this subject. Has he ever heard the people of the West complain about taxes? the oppressive burden of taxation by the General Government? Since the system of protection has gone into successful operation, have not the people been able to purchase all necessary articles of consumption, their cloths, calicoes, cottons, nails, &c., at a cheaper rate, and of a better quality, than they ever could before, or ever can again, under the system of free trade? Has not the ability of the people to pay for these articles been increased? Does not the laborer receive higher wages and more constant employment? Has not the farmer a steadier and better market for his produce, his wheat, flour, corn, beef, pork, and every thing which he raises? Where, or how, can the people be borne down with taxes by this system, if they are more able to purchase, and if the articles to be purchased are to be procured of an improved quality, and at a reduced price? The allegation is fallacious, illusive. But on this subject I have an authority, which will, I know, be satisfactory to my colleague. In the report of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, to which I have already alluded, he uses this language, as to the effect of the system upon the cotton and cotton fabrics: "The establishment of cotton mills in our own country has, unquestionably, increased the demand for the raw article raised here. Goods have become cheaper, the price is but about one-third what we paid formerly, when the fabric was 'freely' imported, and the consumer consequently buys more, because he can procure more with the same money."

Sir, the concluding paragraph of that report portrays in such true and eloquent colours the evils, embarrassments, and distresses of the people, under the operation of "free trade," and the new life and vigor which was infused into the body politic by the adoption of the system to protect our own labor, that I cannot deny the committee the gratification of hearing it read, and, after reading it, I will leave my colleague, and pass to a brief examination of the features of the bill. [Here the Clerk read the paragraph.]

"Upon the whole, then, the minority are decidedly of opinion that the protective system is interwoven with the best interests of the country. The experiment of free trade was fully tested from the peace of 1783, to the adoption of the constitution in 1789. We were then without any general power to impose duties on foreign merchandise, or to adopt measures to countervail injurious regulations. We then submitted, for we could not avoid it, to such selfish regulations as were imposed on commerce and navigation by the laws of foreigners. They did then, as they strive to do now, secure to themselves all the advantages and profits of trade, cramping our enterprise and neutralizing our labor so effectually, that nothing but the murmurs of discontent were heard from one extremity of the confederacy to the other. The country was filled with foreign goods, while it was drained of its specie to pay for them. The pressure of debt was every where felt, and the inability of the people, by the most laborious exertions to save themselves from the downward course, was every where acknowledged. The courts of law were filled with suits; the hands of the sheriffs were filled with executions; and the earnings of a toilsome, economical life, vanished like the vapors of the morning. The people were filled with dismay, and almost began to think if these were the fruits of liberty, they had achieved the revolution in vain. They were not, however, slow to discover the cause of this distress. It was what is now denominated free trade, a trade regulated by the monopolizing laws of other countries, which turned the hard earnings of our working men into the pockets of foreigners. They saw that the only remedy which could be effectual was the establishment of a Government of their own, with power to countervail these monopolies, and give to our labor its appropriate rewards—the fruits of its own earnings. It was this season of calamity that gave birth to the constitution, and established the Government; and who can, without emotions of gratitude, without the most profound veneration for the wisdom of our fathers, contemplate the change which followed? The petitions to the first Congress, already alluded to, spoke a language which could not be misunderstood, and the first acts of that patriotic assembly applied the remedy to the all-pervading evil. It was an act to encourage labor; an act to countervail the injurious operations of foreign laws; an act which reanimated the dying system of the body politic, infused into it new life, new vigor, new courage; and from that time we may, in truth, be called a prosperous, happy, independent people."

R. J. INGERSOLL,
JOHN GILMORE.

The gross and palpable inequalities of the provisions of the bill upon the different interests embraced in it, have been so fully shown by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] and others who have preceded me in the debate, that I will repeat as little as possible what has already been said on the subject.

There is, however, one view which I wish to call to the attention of the committee. In their report, the Committee of Ways and Means recognize the principle, that there are some articles of manufacture "essential to our independence in time of war," which ought to be protected by higher duties than others, and which "demand some sacrifice in time of peace." In this, they and the Secretary of the Treasury have carried out the views expressed by the President of the United States, in his last annual message, in which he says: "Those who take an enlarged view of the condition of our country must be satisfied that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war. Within this scope, on a reasonable scale, it is recommended by every consideration of patriotism and duty, which will doubtless always secure to it a liberal and efficient support."

From these general views, sir, of the Chief Magistrate, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Committee of Ways and Means, I am not disposed to dissent; and the only remaining inquiry is, what are those articles, "essential to our independence in time of war," which ought to receive efficient protection? Here, sir, I do not intend to detain the committee with the expression of my own views and opinions on this subject, but to lay before them an authority which will no doubt have great influence with a majority in this House and in the nation. I refer to the opinions expressed by the present Executive, in his celebrated Coleman letter, before his elevation to the high office which he now holds, and at a time when there was a great anxiety to know what were his views upon the great and important questions of national importance which were then agitating the public mind. I am aware, sir, that this letter, taken as a whole, has been considered as somewhat equivocal in its character; but, on the subject to which I am now directing the attention of the committee, it is clear, unequivocal, and decided. Hear his language: "He (Providence) has filled our mountains and our plains with minerals; with lead, iron, and copper; and given us a climate and soil for the growing of hemp and wool. These being the grand materials of our national defence, they ought to have extended to them adequate and fair protection, that our manufactures and laborers may be placed in fair competition with those of Europe, and that we may have within our own country a supply of those leading and important articles so essential in war."

Thus, sir, has the President put a name upon those articles which he deems to be essential to our safety and independence in time of war. To this list he might have added the article of cotton; and the omission may probably be attributed to the fact, that, at that time, it was sufficiently protected. And now, what are the views of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject? Iron, with them, is the only favorite article which is indispensable to secure the independence of the country in time of war. Now, sir, I admit that it is of essential importance that this article should be protected, and well protected; and, from the best information I can obtain, the protection proposed by this bill would be totally inadequate. Without guns, and the munitions of war, it is certain that the country cannot be defended. But can it be that this is the only essential for that purpose? Is it not as important to render the soldiery efficient, to have them well clothed, and thus protected from the inclemency of the weather, and the exposure of the camp? Is not the soldier's blanket as essential an article as his gun? How can we, then, boast of our independence of foreign nations, if we have to be dependent upon them for this article of prime necessity? And how can we be independent, if we have to draw from foreign nations the raw material out of which those articles of prime necessity are to be manufactured?

Sir, the district whose interest I have the honor to represent on this floor, is purely an agricultural and wool-growing district. My constituents, since the passage of the law of 1828, and under the faith that the Government would continue an efficient protection to every branch of domestic industry, have become largely engaged in the culture of sheep, and have vested in it an immense amount of capital. By care, industry, and economy, those engaged in the business have, thus far, under the protection their industry has received, been enabled to realize a fair and reasonable profit upon their labor and their capital, and no more.

If this bill is adopted, I venture to affirm that, as sure as the sun shines in the firmament, this important branch of American industry must go by the board, and the capital vested in it sacrificed and destroyed. How can it be otherwise? The duty upon this article, under the existing law, is four cents per pound, and fifty per cent. ad valorem; and, even under this high rate of duty, large and extensive importations of the article are made from Europe. In the year 1831, no less than about six millions of pounds were imported. Strike down the duty then immediately to fifteen per cent., which is almost, on the cheap sorts of wool, no duty at all, and how is it possible that our wool-growers can stand against the competition of foreign nations, where, from the density of their population, the carcasses is the primary object in demand, and the fleece merely secondary? They cannot do it. But sir, the committee propose to let them down gradually; not to put their sheep immediately to the knife, but expose them to a lingering and languishing disease and death.

This, sir, will be a poor, miserable consolation to the owners of the flocks; it is cruelty in the extreme.

These things, I say, sir, in the face of the opinion expressed by the Secretary of the Treasury, that this branch of industry needs protection no longer. The evidence upon which he has founded this opinion is no doubt satisfactory to himself, but, unfortunately for the friends of this interest, the documents relating to the subject have not yet been printed, and we have had no opportunity of learning the nature and character of that testimony, or where and from whom it was obtained.

Sir, the county from which I came is, I believe, more extensively engaged in the growing of wool, than any other county in the United States, with the exception of Dutchess, in New York. The character of its wool, in the Eastern market, is not surpassed by that from any other region of the country. In this business are engaged gentlemen of great intelligence, integrity, and experience, who would have most cheerfully answered any interrogatories propounded to them, as to their capital invested, and the average profits upon their care, capital, and labor. Their answers would, I am satisfied, have brought the mind of the honorable Secretary to a different conclusion, and have convinced him that any material change made in the protection now afforded, will paralyze the energies, and, in all probability, sacrifice the interests of those engaged in this branch of industry. And, sir, were this work of destruction to stop with the sacrifice of the capital invested under the invitation of your legislation merely, whatever reason those who have thus made their investments might have to complain of the cruelty and injustice of their Government, still it would be tolerable. But unfortunately, sir, for the great agricultural interest of the country, this will not be the fact. So sure as effect follows cause, the price of produce must fall, and the depreciation of the price and value of lands must follow the reduction in the price of produce. If the immense bodies of land which are now covered with sheep, should, from necessity, be converted to the purposes of raising grain, and other agricultural products, how could it be occupied in such a way as to yield to the farmer a reasonable remuneration for his labor? Where will the farmers of the grain-growing States be able to find vent for the millions of barrels of flour, and other breadstuff, which must be forced into an already glutted market? Now they have a constant, regular, and increasing market at home; but, prostrate this system of protection to home industry, and where is there an opening in the foreign world for a single barrel of American flour? There is none; the markets are all already occupied and glutted.

But, sir, why has the discrimination been made in the bill in favor of the iron interest? Why are some kinds of this article to be protected with a duty of seventy-nine per cent., whilst woollen and cotton fabrics are protected with the trifling duty of twenty, and the interests of the wool-grower by the nominal duty of fifteen? I impute no improper motives to the committee; but for what reason was this discriminating principle adopted? Was it to render the obnoxious features of the bill palatable to the people of Pennsylvania? Was it by gilding the bitter pill to induce them to swallow it? If these were the views entertained, let me tell gentlemen they will find themselves egregiously mistaken. Pennsylvania supports the system as a whole, and in all its parts. She knows, that if a single interest in the protective system is laid low, no part can stand; that if a single link be stricken from the chain, the whole must go.

Again, sir, why is the proposition made by the committee to impose a duty of about thirty per cent. on teas and coffee, which, by the law of 1832, are to be imported free? They enter into competition with nothing which is either the growth or manufacture of the United States; their free importation would affect no branch of American industry; they have become necessary articles of consumption; they are not luxuries, only for the palate of the rich, but are to be found in the family of almost every freeman in the Northern, Middle, and Western States. Why, I ask, impose a duty upon those necessities of life which can come in competition with nothing of American growth or manufacture? The reason is so obvious and glaring, that he who runs may read it. A death blow must be given to the manufacturing, mechanic, and agricultural interests, by reducing their protection to twenty and fifteen per cent This process, whilst it has the effect of protecting American industry, will not bring money enough into the treasury to supply the wants of the Government; and, therefore, it is that the committee propose to make up the deficiency, by levying a duty upon the beverage of every poor white man in the country.

But, sir, let us look a little further into the provisions of this bill, and see their justice and equality. Whilst, as we have seen, the labor and capital of the industrious freemen of the Northern, Middle, and Western States are to be protected by a duty of fifteen per cent., what is the protection extended to an article of Southern production; an article grown by slaves? I allude to the article of tobacco. Upon it, sir, is imposed a duty of thirty-three per cent., which amounts to a duty of prohibition. I am aware, sir, that it is intimated by some of our brethren of Virginia, who are now opposed to the whole protective system, that they care not for this item of protection, and that they would have no objections to its being expunged from the bill; that they now actually export the article, and regard the protection as merely nominal. Now all we have to say, in answer to those gentlemen, is, that this branch of your industry has been protected by a prohibitory duty for forty years, till it has acquired a strength which defies the competition of the world; and all we ask, is, that our interests may receive something like an equivalent protection for two-thirds of that period, and we will be satisfied.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have done. I feel that I have detained the committee too long, and will conclude by expressing a hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut will be adopted, and the bill rejected.

Mr. ROOT, of New York, followed. He said he did not suppose that the bill now submitted to their consideration was originated with any view of altering the system of protective policy, which, it seemed, was established in this country; its origination in the present session was, unquestionably, owing to the organized, and, if they pleased, legal opposition offered by one portion of the country against the collection of revenue under the tariff laws of 1828 and 1832. Unquestionably the bill before the House was introduced for the accomplishment of the purposes recommended by the President at the opening of the session, and with a view to conciliate, if possible, their Southern brethren, and to induce them to stay their hand in opposing the laws. This bill, then, whether regarded as an act of justice, or as a sacrifice offered up on the altar of their country, was certainly a laudable measure. As an act of justice, he was willing to support it. He had ever believed, and he still believed, that the imposition of taxes, by way of duties on imports, further than was necessary to meet the just demands of the Government, was both oppressive and unjust; and that to lay such duties, was to take from one citizen for the purpose of giving to another. If the duty were laid merely by way of protection, somebody must be the loser, and it must be done for the benefit of somebody who was to be the gainer by it; because, the world was made no richer by the imposition of these duties; they accumulated no additional wealth in the world; they brought no additional treasures into the nation; they could not do so, because they were not creative in their effects. They had this effect, and they could have no other; they made the price for a given article, purchased from the American manufacturer, higher than it would be if no such duties existed. It was evident, then, that the manufacturer was benefited by them; he was the gainer, and the consumer must be the loser. He had said that those duties gave no additional treasure to the nation; perhaps it would be argued that they acted as an incentive to a greater degree of industry, and that, therefore, they did enrich the nation. Why, sir, said Mr. R., if this be your only object, you might as well tax the people in some other way, to pay the laborer for doing that which would be of no use when done; but I imagine, sir, the people will hardly feel it just that they should be ground down by taxes, merely, forsooth, for the purpose of making them more industrious in the performance of useless drudgeries imposed on them by their masters. At the opening of the session, I was rejoiced exceedingly to find a feature in the message of the Executive, which so completely conformed to my own views on taxation. I did hope that those views would be carried through, and sustained by Congress. I still hope they will, and with this modification, that the duties shall be laid in such a manner as to raise a moderate revenue, sufficient for the expenses and exigencies of the Government, and no more; and, at the same time, incidentally protect American industry. Mr. R. said that a bill, modified in this shape, would have his most cordial support. There was one modification which he must especially require at the hands of the committee; it was, that the agricultural produce, which was the great staple of the county in which he resided, should not be left entirely destitute of protection; but that, on the contrary, the raw material should receive the same protection, whatever it might be, which was given to the manufacturer for goods manufactured from it: the article to which he alluded was wool.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania might suppose that the spot where he resided was more highly favored of heaven, and that, therefore, it was of most consequence to the nation. Be it so. But the county in which I reside, said Mr. R., situated on yonder hills, contains a larger quantity of sheep, in proportion to its population, as computed at its last census, and likewise in proportion to the number of cultivated acres, than any other county in the Union. And he would tell gentlemen that the tariff of 1828, he might say the tariff of 1824, but more especially that of 1828, bore harder upon the people of that county than it did on any other county, either in Carolina or in Georgia. They had, indeed, the solace, that then it was that a duty was imposed on wool; wool was protected; and, in a county where they paid annually to the treasury duties to the amount of sixty or seventy thousand dollars. This was the only thing which sweetened the bitter draught; for he could assure the House the duties on sugar was no sweetener; their only solace was the duty on wool, and the consequent high price of the fleece. The bill before the House proposed to take that protection away; but if from wool, let them take it from wools also, and not hire Europeans to cross the Atlantic to work up the raw material here. Let them work up their own, or let the raw material be shipped from this country to work up there, rather than give a bounty to workmen to cross the Atlantic. This act of 1828, which he had heard denominated the bill of abominations, he rather regarded as a righteous dispensation of affliction on the land, to punish and humiliate the people for the evils they had perpetrated, the political evils in relation to an approaching presidential election. If not a dispensation of Providence, on this account, it certainly grew out of causes connected with President-making. Yes, sir, said Mr. R., this evil was fastened on the country, not irremediably I hope, but it was fastened on the country in the scuffle to continue the then incumbent in office, on one side, and on the other, to oust him, and put in another in his stead. One of the greatest evils which the country had ever experienced, was in this manner inflicted upon it; the public weal was unregarded, and the only question was, shall we give preference to A or B for the presidential chair? It might be recollected (Mr. R. said) that when it was thought necessary to secure a certain State in favor of the then incumbent, a convention was called at Harrisburg to buy them over. On the other side another convention was called, who mounted the same hobby; the price offered was the same on both sides, a high tariff. Delegates were elected who endeavored to outdo each other in this race for popularity, and they brought the same feelings into Congress. The question then was, who is the greatest tariff man? We must have him. One candidate was thought to be a favorite, because he was supposed to be a warm friend of the protective system, and would support a high tariff; but they were told, on the other side, that their candidate would go for as high a tariff; so that even some of the Eastern members, put to the blush, had voted against him. Since, however, they had been brought into these difficulties by this cause, let them endeavor to get out as well as they could; and, with this view, let them now pass a "judicious tariff."

But gentlemen appeared to feel some alarm about passing such a bill just now. He had heard it said, to be sure, it was in a confabulatory manner; but he had heard it said that it would not do to pass a bill reducing the duties at the present session. Why not? Because, forsooth, it would be regarded as an evidence of fear, or as an abject submission, under the threats of one State of the Union, which, it seemed, had put itself in hostile array against the present tariff laws. What! said Mr. R., because that State has, by its convention, declared its grievances, and has further declared that, inasmuch as it considers those laws unjust and unconstitutional, it also considers them null and void; because of this, is nothing left us but to bear the strong arm of power? Will it be an exhibition of cowardice, an evidence of fear? Will it show submission to South Carolina, to do that which is right and just? For my own part, sir, I shall not feel my own individual honor wounded if this offering be made, whether it be on the altar of justice, or on that of concord. Be just, and fear not. Is it an act of justice? Do it, then. Is it an act of conciliation, a sacrifice, if you will, on the altar of concord? If it is that, and that alone, willingly, sir, will I, for one, make it.

Mr. R. said he knew it had been said, even by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAKEBORN] it was said, that he must either suppose himself demented, or that the Carolinians had run mad. No such thing. It would take the strongest evidence to convince him [Mr. R.] of the dementation of the gentleman from Massachusetts. That the people of South Carolina had gone further than he should have gone, with all his Northern phlegm about him, he admitted. But what had South Carolina done? It was declared by the people, in convention, that those two acts of Congress were null and void. All else they had done was for the purpose of establishing and defining the declaration they had made. Well, were these laws unconstitutional, or were they not? This appeared to him the main question; and on this position, it appeared to him, hung every thing pertaining to the measure.

Suppose, said Mr. R., that we admit that they are unconstitutional. Would not you, Mr. Chairman, as a Georgian, (Mr. WAXE was in the chair,) should not I, as a New Yorker, at once declare, if palpably unconstitutional, that they were null and void? Most assuredly. Every man in his senses, knowing any thing of the constitution, would, in such a case, pronounce them so. Whether these laws are constitutional or not, is the question to be decided. Perhaps some will say it depends on the condition of the mind so pronouncing; that as the man thinks, so is he. For myself, I must unequivocally declare that I never doubted that these laws were constitutional in their enactment; I believe the powers exercised in their enactment are delegated to Congress. Nobody doubts the power to impose taxes. That was the first object of the new constitution, and it was the most essential object of the amendment, as it is called, to the articles of confederation. But to employ this power to a protective policy, to use it merely as a measure of protection, our friends of the South think this unconstitutional. North Carolina herself acknowledges that this is unconstitutional. We, of the North and East, on the contrary, think it constitutional. Why do we think so? Because it is supposed by our people to be of advantage to them. If injurious to any one, it is felt more deeply by the people of the South than by us. What we think to be right, that is to say, what is most profitable to us, it is pretty easy to convince ourselves is likewise constitutional. We argue this way, Mr. Chairman: the first object of the present framing of the constitution was to make the people happy. Now, the tariff laws of 1828 produce that effect in the North and the East; and, therefore, we naturally conclude that they must be constitutional. The people of the South, on the other hand, feel these laws to be oppressive and unjust. They require no long course of argument, no great stretch of reasoning, to convince them that what is oppressive and unjust was never authorized by the constitution of their beloved country. Here, then, is the difference. Now, I believe, myself, that the people of South Carolina, feeling the oppression and injustice of the tariff of 1828, are as honest in their opinion of its unconstitutionality, as we of the North and East, in our opinion, that the constitution not only warrants, but invites such a measure.

Then, sir, if we can believe, and it requires, I think, no great stretch of charity, if we can believe that South Carolina and our Southern friends are honest in their belief of the unconstitutionality of these laws, I beg to know whether we are not required not only by the dictates of charity and benevolence, but by the principles of justice, to restore those rights of which they allege you have robbed them.

It is said, sir, that they demand that an equal per centage, or nearly so, shall be placed on all imports; that there shall be no protective duties, either direct or incidental; and that, therefore, in passing this law, we shall do nothing towards conciliation. But, sir, I do believe, that if we let South Carolina know that we are disposed to do her justice, she will not rigidly adhere either to the form or principles of no protective duties; I believe she will yield the point to which she is now, perhaps, disposed to adhere, when she knows that the imposition of protective duties is considered, by a large majority of the American people, to be constitutional. But even on this point, will you send an armed force against her, in battle array, to compel her to be convinced of her error in the position she has taken? Before I pass on, sir, to indulge a few moments on the subject of nullification, which is represented to us as a hideous monster, of gorgon shape, size, and appearance, I will put a case: Let us suppose that to have happened which had been suggested in one of the papers, and which, for aught I know, may actually take place. Let us suppose that the State of New York should nullify the decision of the Supreme Court, with regard to the oyster-beds on the Jersey shore; or, let us suppose that Congress should, by an act, annex the city of New York, the Isle of Manhattans, to the State of New Jersey. Suppose this to be done. The State of New Jersey sends her process across from Paulus' Hook, to take possession; and thus attempts to bind the place to the sway of that State. What think you, Mr. Chairman, the people of the city of New York would do in such a case? Would they apply to their State Legislature, to apply to the Legislature of another State, to apply to Congress, that Congress might apply to all the States, to ascertain whether it was proper to annex the city of New York to the State of New Jersey? Would they not rather at once resist the unjust attempt? Well, sir, this would be nullification, frightful as it may appear.

Mr. R. said he would suppose another case, which might be considered more analogous to that of South Carolina. He would suppose that Congress should pass a law imposing a direct tax throughout the United States, say a tax of six millions. Out of this, two millions was to be raised in the State of New York. Now, although this would be double the amount which New York ought to pay of the tax, yet he had no doubt gentlemen would argue, and ingeniously prove, that it was quite consistent with an equality of taxation. It would be argued there, and he had no doubt judges might be found who would say the argument was correct, that the equality of taxation depended on the ability to pay; that New York, the empire State, was able to pay double the amount of any other State, and that, therefore, the tax was equal. Having settled the justice and equity of the measure so satisfactorily, he would suppose they should send out a collector who would undertake to collect this tax. Would not every one, judges, jurors, every body, with one accord, pronounce such a law null and void? Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. R.) depend upon it, it would require a stronger force than you are about to concentrate in the South, to carry such a law into execution. But, gentlemen would say, this might be right enough, when a law is palpably unconstitutional. Palpably unconstitutional! Who, he would ask, were to be the judges of this palpability? Would they leave it to the Supreme Court, or were they to go the round of the States, or refer it to a convention? He did believe they need do either one or the other. What was the difference of the cases between the secession law and the one under consideration? He would show the difference. The secession law was, of itself, without reference to the constitution, odious in the eyes of the nation. The law imposing these taxes had bright and engaging features in the view of more than half the nation. It was easy to make the people believe that the secession law was unconstitutional, because of those odious features; they were unwilling to be told that they should not abuse those who had the administration of the Government; to be gagged, in the language of the day; therefore, it was no harm to nullify the secession law. I, myself, said Mr. R., was a nullifier then. On the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions being presented by Governor Jay to the Legislature of New York, a resolution came up, of a character similar to that of the present day. It was proposed to refer the matter to the Judiciary. One party, it was the party to which he [Mr. R.] then belonged, to which he still belonged, and hoped ever to belong, whilst he had breath—that party opposed this resolution. It was supposed by them that the Judiciary was never authorized by the States to judge of matters extraneous to the constitution; that the Judiciary was appointed to judge of all matters which arose under the constitution, but not of matters which did not arise under it; and for the obvious reason, that every thing opposed to the constitution was null and void, as a matter of course, and the judges never had the power given them to judge on that which was declared null and void by the authority of the States. A pretty large number, on the occasion to which he referred, were of opinion that it was competent for a State to pronounce an opinion as to the constitutionality of laws. That number, however, did not amount to a majority; but not two years elapsed, before that party was able to give the votes of New York State to Thomas Jefferson. By that vote, then, they became nullifiers. A good deal of doctrinal matter was put forth, as to the right of nullification, and also as to the right of secession. It was said that a State could not nullify, without going out of the Union by that very act; that to nullify a law was, ipso facto, (he asked pardon, he believed they did not talk Latin,) a going out of the Union. What, said Mr. R., to declare that a pretended act of Congress is no act of Congress; is that to go out of the Union? To declare that a thing which has no existence is a nullity, as regards the power it assumes; is that going out of the Union? To declare the truth as to that nullity;

to say that it is no law; is that going out of the Union? How was it in the case of a number of copartners, connected under the same bond and obligation? A portion of them were for doing a nefarious act; one of the partners said, they had no right to do it, that he would not abide by that act; was this a going out of the copartnership? Where there were eleven rogues, and one honest man, could not that one be honest, without going out of the partnership? He hoped it was possible.

There were wonderful doctrines abroad now-a-days on the subject of secession. Some maintained that a State had a right to secede whenever it pleased; others maintained that the State wishing to secede must ask leave of absence; and that a majority of the other States must give that leave, without which the single State could not depart. He [Mr. R.] was inclined to the opinion that it required the consent of all the copartners for one to secede, because it required the consent of all for one to come in; he should think it required the same for one to go out. To be sure, less than the whole, less than a unanimous consent, might modify the articles of copartnership; and so it was with regard to the States; a majority, three-fourths of the States, (not of the people, that was a new doctrine,) could modify the constitution, but they could not destroy it; what they did must be in the nature of an amendment. Under the constitution, therefore, he should think that the whole of the United States, each State for itself, must give their consent for one member to depart. Being framed by all, it seemed to him that it required the same power to destroy which it did to create. South Carolina, however, supposed she had the right to withdraw without the consent of all; but he believed that this was only conditional, on the employment of an armed force to execute laws which she considered unconstitutional.

Mr. R. continued by observing that the doctrine was, that all power is derived from the people and that the people have a right to resume that power whenever an encroachment shall be made upon their constitutional liberties. In the convention held in the State of New York, prior to the adoption of the constitution, it was fully manifest that they were not disposed to create a consolidated Government, possessed of powers paramount to the authority of the States. Preparatory to the ratification of the constitution, a declaration of rights was issued on the part of New York, proposing, also, amendments to the constitution, as then proposed for adoption. The members from that State were required to present them before the question of ratification should be settled. These amendments went to the effect of reserving the authority of the States, and the rights of the citizens, and confining the General Government, which the States were about to create, to the exercise of those powers which were expressly surrendered. They were drawn up, Mr. R. was understood by the reporter to say, by one of the most eminent statesmen that New York had ever given birth to, and they were considered to express the sentiments of the democracy of the State congregated in convention. The illustrious George Clinton was the president of that body, and in their declaration the right was declared, in the most explicit terms, that the powers granted should be resumed, if necessary for the happiness of those by whom such powers were surrendered.

Mr. R. here read from the authority to which he referred. The passage cited was to the effect that the powers given could be resumed in the event of an abuse of them.

This proposition was one of ten that went the grand rounds of the nation on that occasion. It was ratified, and became part and parcel of the Union. But whether the doctrine of secession was to be permitted or not, was now, with the proclamation, the message, the ordinance, and the other documents which had appeared on the subject, the common theme of conversation. In considering the relative rights of the General and the State Governments, it would be well to call to their recollection the events which had occurred in times long gone by, in order to arrive at a knowledge of the principles which should now govern us. For his own part, he thought that South Carolina was not acting the traitorous part which many allege she is acting. He was fully aware that she might be mistaken in some of her notions; but even suppose that State was engaged in acts which would amount to a palpable violation of the constitution, did not justice require that conciliation should be used towards a State which had just cause for standing forward in the defence of its rights?

Mr. R. next referred to that portion of the message of the President at the commencement of the session, which relates to the protection of the States from the controlling power and influence of the General Government, and observed that it was with rejoicing he had perceived the recommendation to take away the power of domineering over the State authorities. He was glad, also, at the doctrine being laid down, that in the case of uncertain and doubtful powers the Government ought not to act. In fact, what doctrine, Mr. R. asked, could be more correct than this? The recommendation also of the sale of the bank stock possessed by the United States, and the stock held by the nation in other incorporated companies, must have been made with the view, he conceived, of tending to the diminution of the influence which the General Government might have by its possession over the elections in the States. All these showed, in his opinion, how sedulously careful the Executive was in the object of diminishing the influence which, as he had before observed, the General Government might be supposed to have, by these means, over the State elections. But he [Mr. R.] did not, for his own part, perceive how the elections in the State of Maryland, for instance, could be effected by the stock held by the Government in the Chesapeake and Ohio, or the Chesapeake and Delaware canals; but it had nevertheless been recommended to dispose of this stock, in order, it was presumed, to render the State free, sovereign, and independent.

Mr. R. proceeded by adverting to the proclamation, the war proclamation, as he termed it, recently issued by the President, against the rebellious subjects in the State of South Carolina. In that proclamation he had observed political sentiments revolting to his [Mr. R.'s] notions of constitutional Government. He was sorry, indeed, to say that that document expressed opinions which had always been considered by him, and by that political party with whom he generally acted, as utterly heterodox; and if they should be favored by the national sanction, it would, he had no doubt, require years of political revolution to repair the error. It was, he said, with perfect astonishment that he had read the announcement of such a doctrine as that which declared that the Executive Government was the representative of one people; in other words, that it was a unity, a Government of itself, and not a Government which was the representative of the States forming this Union.

Mr. R. argued upon this point for some time, and asked, in conclusion, whether the electoral colleges were not the colleges of the States, separately and respectively, and whether each State had not the power to change the composition of its college, and the time and mode of its meeting, as it should choose? And yet the doctrines had been urged in a popular document, with all the overwhelming influence of the Government, that that Government was a unity; the people, the American people, were to be told that it would be right to carry on a war against South Carolina and her rebellious sons, because the General Government of the whole American people is a consolidated Government.

This doctrine of consolidation, Mr. R. said, he knew was a favorite with an old party in the country; but, for himself, he had always protested against it, as involving a doctrine, and the exercise of a power, denied by the constitution, and repudiated by the patriots and whigs of the revolution.

[Here, on the motion of Mr. CARSON, the committee rose, and the House adjourned. On the following day]

Mr. ROOT resumed the remarks in which he was interrupted on the preceding day, by the motion to adjourn. He observed that it belonged to him to express his grateful feeling for the profound attention with which he had been listened to, up to the period when his argument had been suspended by the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CARSON] that the committee should rise. The indulgence then-shown him could not but act as an admonition to be brief in his concluding remarks; and he should, therefore, condense them in as small a compass as his poor talents would admit, if not as small as the House would desire. He would, in the first place, recur to his remarks of yesterday, under the impression that he was either misunderstood, or that he failed in giving a clear expression of his sentiments. He knew very well that misconceptions would arise of the declared opinions of a person speaking on a subject of such extreme importance, and in times of such high excitement, and that it might be supposed that asseverations of supporting certain doctrines, in the course of an argument of warmth and feeling, were mere expletives. From some suggestions which he had heard out of that House, he was confident he had been—he would not say misrepresented, but certainly misunderstood, in respect to some of the points upon which he had addressed the committee. In the observations which he had deemed it his duty to make in relation to that part of the message of the President which recommends the sale of the bank stock, and of the other stocks held by the nation in incorporated companies, and on the overweening influence in State elections which the possession of that stock gave to the General Government, he had not designed to speak disrespectfully of the Chief Magistrate, or to impute to him improper or sinister motives in the exercise of any part of that influence, whatever it might be. He had expressly mentioned that it showed a sedulous care on the part of the Executive to preserve the State Governments from the pollution and corruption which possibly accompany or follow the operation of such an influence, in regard to their elections. He admired the motives which led to the manifestation of such a care on the part of the President, and, at the same time, he should, with equal earnestness, regret the occurrence of any event which could, by any means, show that the operation of the influence over State authorities, arising from this source, had taken, or could take place, whether from the Government or any of its agents.

But the point to which he was more particularly anxious to call their attention, in connexion with his former remarks, was the subject of nullification, and the identification of himself with the term nullification, which, according to the lexicographers of the day, was of modern origin. It had been said by an honorable gentleman that he [Mr. R.] might be considered as one of the fathers of nullification; but in the present common acceptance of the term, this did not by any means ensue as a necessary consequence, from the remarks which he had submitted yesterday. He had then declared that a law of Congress, which was palpably unconstitutional, is, as a matter of course, in itself null and void; and he now repeated that same declaration, and he challenged a denial of the correctness of the position. But as to nullification, in the sense in which it was expressly coined or used in or for South Carolina, and applied against the tariff, or the protective system, he meant as applicable to the revenue laws of the United States, he must say that he disclaimed

it. In that sense of the term, Mr. R. said, I disclaim being a nullifier, because I believe those laws to have been constitutional, from the origin of our Government. If arguments, he said, were necessary to be advanced in support of this, he might urge, with confidence, those contained in the able letter of one of his colleagues to a distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, in which the principles of constitutional law, on this subject, were developed, and placed in so broad a light as to carry conviction to almost all who had taken them into view.

[The reporter understood the allusion made by Mr. Root to be to the letter of Mr. VERPLANCK to Mr. DRAYTON, on the constitutionality of the tariff system.]

Mr. R. continued, by repeating the expression of his opinion, that the nullification of a law palpably unconstitutional was not only proper, but laudable and praiseworthy. He said he had never been so well versed in what he might call the schools of attorneyship, as to learn the terms of process to be applied under the recent Executive message. His doctrines had their source in another school—that of the convention of New York, which ratified the constitution of the United States. But, in referring to this, he was apprehensive that he had been deemed an advocate of the doctrine that a State could secede from the Union whenever it might think proper. This was something like the principle advanced in the first Congress, by some who maintained that measures should be submitted to the State Legislatures for their approbation and consent. He [Mr. R.] did not deny the validity of the argument, that, inasmuch as all the States had agreed to the union in the first instance, no individual State can secede or withdraw, without the agreement and consent of all to such withdrawal; that is, unless there be an utter abrogation of the compact itself. The other members of the compact must agree to the secession, as they had previously agreed to the covenant of association. If it were broken by the consent of the co-covenanters in this manner, then it would be null and void; for, the covenant being broken, none could be any longer bound by its provisions.

Yesterday, Mr. R. said, he was commenting on that portion of the President's proclamation which went to persuade forbearance on the part of South Carolina. He regretted that that doctrine urged the maintenance of principles unknown to the constitution, and heterodox in the opinion of those who maintained the good old republican doctrines which animated the members of the great convention of 1787, and the patriarchs of our freedom, the fruit of whose exertions was the great civil revolution of 1798, 1799, and 1800.

Mr. R. here went into a recapitulation of his former argument in support of the rights of the States as such, and apostrophizing the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. WARREN,] in illustration of the point before them, asked if the citizens of Georgia considered that distinguished gentleman to be a Representative in Congress of the United States, or a Representative whose duties were imposed upon him by the suffrages of the citizens of his own State. Certainly, said Mr. R., the latter; and, as such, with respect to himself, he deemed to be the bonds which connected him with his own State. And yet, he observed, this doctrine that each member of that House is a Representative of the whole United States, and not of the State whence he comes, is urged to South Carolina as a reason for submission to laws, against the constitutionality of which South Carolina so strenuously protests. Mr. R. said, further, that it was sufficient for him to represent, in part, the interests of New York, (and would that he could represent them more ably,) and, in saying this, he must not be understood as insensible to his duty to attend to the interests of the whole Union; but he solemnly declared that he neither could nor would assent to the doctrine—the consolidating doctrine, that a member from one State was a Representative of the whole nation.

Representation, then, and direct taxation, were to be throughout the States in the same proportion; it was the old revolutionary doctrine that they were to go hand in hand together. In one House the States were to be represented equally; in the other, in the same proportion as they were found to contribute to the public burdens. Wherefore, then, were they to be told that the members of that House were the Representatives of a consolidated Government, instead of the Representatives of the States, as separate, distinct, and independent political communities? Again: this proclamation, as a reason why South Carolina should obey, assumes that the laws of Congress operate on the citizens of this great Union as individuals, and not on the States; by which it was meant to show, he supposed, that the people of the States owe a supreme allegiance to the General Government, instead of an allegiance to the State Governments. But this was in direct opposition to the constitution, which, in every part, made its operation to act upon the States, and not on the individuals of the whole United States. Its operation on the States was evidenced in a long list of particulars, in which, it is said, the States could not act; they were forbidden to do many things under the constitution; and then, again, there were certain things which they were required to do; it operated, therefore, on the State Governments, on the State sovereignties; this operation extended so far, and no farther than what the people forming those political communities had consented to grant. But again: in order to show that this was one consolidated Government, and that the Government of the Union was paramount to those of the States, the proclamation referred them back to their condition under the royal Government, when, as it declared, the several colonies were united, as they were afterwards, under the confederation, to form one nation. And so they were, as much then as now, though not possessing such extensive powers. Under the confederation, each having one vote, they formed one nation, for the purpose of regulating their intercourse with foreign nations; but not for the management of the civil concerns of their respective jurisdiction. For general purposes, which could not be managed unless they united—their post office and intercourse with foreign nations—for these purposes they agreed to unite. What was there in the new constitution to change the national character of the Union? Nothing. They were left independent, sovereign States as before. In the old convention there were two difficulties which they were unable to surmount: the first was that of raising a revenue to provide for the payment of the national debt contracted during the revolution, and the ordinary exigencies of the Government. To accomplish this object, they called on the States to surrender five per cent. of their imports. Another difficulty, to overcome which the convention was called, was, to provide a national judiciary, in order to execute treaties with foreign Governments. It was perceived that the State judiciaries might throw impediments in the way of collecting British debts, and complying with other provisions contained in the treaty of peace. For that purpose a national judiciary was created to judge of treaties, so as to make treaties, thus approved, superior to the State laws, or any obstacles which the States might throw in the way of their Executive. These, then, were the two reasons for which the convention was called—to appoint a judiciary to decide on all differences growing out of the constitution—on all laws growing out of the constitution—more especially treaties with foreign nations. But they never gave that judiciary power to decide on questions extraneous to and out of the constitution. That constitution was framed with all the reserved rights of the States carefully ascertained and defined. For this purpose it was that conventions were called in the several States, beginning with Massachusetts, after two or three States, by the by, had ratified it without any provisions whatever: the precautionary measure went round the several States—North Carolina was the last; the result was a list of provisions, and names, the framers of those provisions, which did honor to the convention. In New York State, Chancellor Livingston drew up a document, with masterly sagacity; and he [Mr. R.] must state it as his opinion, that the constitution would not have been ratified had it not been for the midway suggested and pointed at by Chancellor Livingston. Mr. R. proceeded to pass high encomiums on other prominent characters connected with these transactions—George Clinton and the Lansing's, Yates's, and Melancthon Smiths of the day.

The whole scope of what were denominated the doctrinal points in the proclamation, tended to a consolidation of the Union, and to an utter subduing of State rights, State authority, and State prerogatives. Yes, and when the doctrine of State rights, as formerly claimed and asserted by their patriot fathers, was brought in question, they were told that it was metaphysical, that it was an abstraction, not to be yielded; nay, not to be borne, in the eye of modern liberal philosophy. There were, however, he believed, metaphysical truths; and, if he was not mistaken, there were abstract principles, which would always remain the same; which they could not make conformable to convenient principles, nor change with the changes of the times. Yes, there were certain fixed principles, call them abstractions, or metaphysical, as they pleased, which would bid defiance to the sneers of modern political philosophers. Those principles were to be found in the constitution; and there they would remain, notwithstanding it was now attempted to tear them out, by arguments undertaking to show that they ought not to be there.

Perhaps these arguments were just. It might be, perhaps, well that a nation, so extended in its territory, so numerous—a nation, too, if not corrupt, so ripe for corruption—it might be well, perhaps, that it should be made one entire Government, as gentlemen would fain persuade them it was already. A time arrived when the Dutch republic found it better to relinquish the condition of a purely republican form of Government; corruption was seen to be abroad in the land; the common weal was forgotten, and the emulation of patriotism had given place to the struggle for filthy lucre; then it was that the Dutch people thought it better to make a stadtholder, and him for life. Perhaps the time had arrived when it would be well for this country to follow their example. But if so, let it be done at once—boldly, openly, honestly. Let a convention of the States be called, and the Government declared one whole consolidated Government; let them at once give up State rights, and trample that which was now sneered at as a metaphysical abstraction, under their feet. By the by, said Mr. R., I should not be willing to be an actor in such a scene; let those do it to whom it would seem to be so desirable. It might seem a bold proposition; but he was not certain, appearing as it did in a document so commanding, and advanced in such a cause, he was not certain that the nation would not readily consent to give up their liberties, to dissolve the State authorities, and form themselves into an empire, under some favorite leader. He, for one, would not be an actor in scenes like these. Sir, said Mr. R., a principle like this, thus urged, is deeply to be lamented. It is urged in a popular cause, and it emanates from a popular source; and, therefore, its effects cannot fail to be deeply injurious.

To avert to the subject of the South. He did not think it possible that South Carolina could persuade the majority of the United States that the revenue duties on imports were not warranted by the constitution, where they afforded any thing like protection to domestic industry, or to the produce of the industry of our own country. The time had not arrived yet, when another proposition might be applied; that Congress could not raise more revenue than was necessary for the purposes of the Government. That time had not yet arrived; the Government had not hitherto raised more than it needed. He admitted that the payment of the national debt had been hastened—imprudently, as he thought, and injuriously to the interests of this country; he believed, if its payment had been more gradual, it would have been better for the country; because, when they stopped a large revenue suddenly short, it produced a great obstruction in the current of many transactions; and the stream could not flow as healthfully as if each obstruction had not been interposed. All this, however, had been overlooked. It had been a popular time to descant upon—that this country was so soon to present the novel spectacle of a great and free nation out of debt. Yes! this had been a matter of boast—a matter of self-gratulation, as well as congratulation; and, he must confess, that to him the boast was more like the rattle, the bauble of the child, than the dignified pride of the statesman. That time not having yet arrived, when more revenue would be raised than the calls of the Government required, and the speedy payment of the national debt having been sanctioned by the call of the nation, South Carolina had nothing to complain of in this respect. A few years ago, it had been the favorite theme of statesmen, that they would have a surplus revenue; and the great desideratum was, how should it be employed—how expended? But a little more than three years ago, a retention of the protective duties was recommended, notwithstanding it was seen that they would produce a surplus revenue. That was the time when high tariff was the order of the day; it was just after the scuffle who should switch the hobby with the keenest cuts; just after, too, that, in the great State, a great meeting had been held in its capital, to resolve on high tariff protecting duties; just after, too, when a distinguished orator had thundered in the capital of the great State, with all the mouth of the Albany Executive; it was just after a resolution had been passed in the Legislature of that State, instructing their Representatives in Congress to vote for high protecting duties on imports. He, [Mr. R.] with a few more, had opposed the resolution; but they were not numerous enough to ask for the ayes and noes. Times, however, had changed; and men had changed with the times. At all events, there was a change of sentiments at head quarters, and perhaps it had extended through the nation.

He could not help noticing, however, a great discrepancy in the sentiments with which they were favored from head quarters. In a certain proclamation, which had been issued some few days ago, there were principles asserted which had not been regarded as orthodox, even by the high federal school. In the message which had subsequently been communicated to Congress, he was happy to find those very principles which he [Mr. R.] had himself always avowed and advocated, and to which he should always adhere. He had read this document with much care, particularly those parts which might be called doctrinal, and which were written with as much carefulness and nicety as if they were penned by a doctor of politics. There were, indeed, one or two slight aberrations, where the writer seemed to fall into the whole system of Government; but those, he presumed, were mere inadvertencies. He so much approved of some portions of this document, that he had marked in the margin some of its language and sentiments, which he should suppose it would be the pride of a republican people to adopt. He did not ascribe the discrepancy, to which he had alluded, to fickleness or change in the mind of any one; he considered it as growing, necessarily, out of the present order of things.

The Tariff, Manufactures, &c.

The immortal Washington, when this Government first went into operation, had the power to make an unwritten constitution, having all the effect of a written one. One of the powers confided to him was that of calling persons of high talents to assist him, as his cabinet council. He called that council; for what purpose? But as ciphers to advise with him, and to have some agency in the operations of the Government. And, from that time to the present, he believed that the members of the cabinet had had and exercised such agency; although the whole responsibility was not here ascribed to them, as it was in England. There was a time, indeed, when four did not make one exactly; when the council went not exactly in unity or harmony; then the ministers could scarcely be held as responsible. But now, when all was concord and unity—so it was understood—in the cabinet, it must be supposed that they had an agency in the management of the affairs of the Government. It was not to be supposed that the Chief Magistrate did every thing with his own head or his own hands; in this respect the Government of this country was not an exception to all others. Was not this, then, a reasonable way of accounting for the direct and palpable way of accounting for the direct and palpable contradictions which issued apparently from one source, the hands of the Executive? However, this might be well enough. The Fox and Grenville administration did well enough in England; and a similar one, perhaps, might manage here.

He would turn to a point of more importance. Would not South Carolina, if they passed the bill under consideration, retrace her steps? It was said that her convention had adjourned—that her Legislature had adjourned—that her law was enacted—and the means of carrying it into execution ready to be applied—and that, therefore, there was no hope but that the sword must be drawn. Was it so? Was it not in the power of the Executive authority of South Carolina to stay its hand awhile? Was it not in the power of the Executive authority of the United States to forbear awhile—that was to say, forbear unless it was perceived that a direct force was exerted in opposition to the laws. He did entertain a hope that this was possible; and he was the more anxious to pass this bill, because he did believe that the existing laws were constitutional, and that it was the duty of the Executive of the United States to see that they are faithfully executed. South Carolina, it was said, believed that they were not constitutional; but should she not, situated as she was, in a questionable, a doubtful position, make the best of her argument—should she not, and would she not, wait awhile to see if a conciliation might take place? He was not induced to hope this, because he believed South Carolina had run mad. If he could believe that that State was governed by mad men, he should have no hope; but when he saw she was governed by rational men, who must perceive that this case, to make the best of it, was a doubtful one, he did hope that she would wait, and let those doubts, if possible, be removed by the withdrawal of the offensive law.

He had said yesterday that he was anxious that this bill should pass; but that there were some modifications which he should require to be made to it before he gave it his cordial assent. It was, that a tariff should be so formed as to meet the condition of the country, and bear on all with an equal hand; that it should contain such provisions as would give at least equal protection to the products of the soil as it gave to the products of labor. In this country land was the cheapest article, because the supply was greater than the demand; land, then, was their great staple. In England they have more people than they have land; of course, land was there the dearest article—labor the cheapest. Was it not the policy of all Governments to encourage that which was its own, rather than that which was exotic? That which was indigenous, if of equal quality, rather than that of foreign growth? Labor was dear here, because laborers were proportionally few. Should not the produce of land be encouraged then, when, with the addition of labor, it must give the greatest accession of wealth to the country? It should, in his opinion, have a higher protection than iron. Why? Because iron was chiefly the produce of labor. The wool, the cotton, and the sugar of the country were the productions of labor and land combined; and a cent's worth of duty given to labor applied to land, would give two cents worth of profit.

He wished, at the proper time, to propose an amendment to the bill, having for its object to impose the same duty on the raw materials, wool and cotton, as was to be imposed on cotton and woollen goods.

Mr. R. concluded his remarks by a summary of the positions he had maintained in the preceding parts of his speech. He thought that no more taxes should be raised than are sufficient to meet the exigencies of the Government; that Congress had no right to take from one man to give to another—to rob Peter to pay Paul. To do this was only to disturb the equality of conditions, and make one poor and another rich, by legislation; all taxes ought to be imposed in a manner the least onerous to the people. For this purpose, the taxes should be such that the people could either pay them or leave it alone, at their pleasure; such were taxes on articles which taste or pride—pride most of them—might induce people to pay. How were such taxes to be imposed? On such articles as they could make themselves better than they could get them elsewhere. Then, at the same time they laid taxes, with a view to raising a sufficient revenue, and no more, they might, at the same time, incidentally give protection to American produce and American industry. With taxes possessing those characteristics, would not South Carolina be content? Would not the American people, from one extremity of the country to the other, be content? Would not their infant manufactures flourish as far as they could, under the fostering care of the Government? It was not, however, healthy or proper for this country to undertake to rival England in the cheapness as well as the quality of her articles. In this country, where the people were thinly scattered over a vast extent of country, it was not necessary that they should rival, in the prices of their workshops, that island, which had been so aptly called the workshop of Europe. He hoped encouragement would be given to the manufacturers of this country, to those the encouragement of which would really benefit the country, but not to those which were uncongenial to their soil and climate, and uncongenial also to their republican institutions.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18.

THE TARIFF, MANUFACTURES, &c.

The resolution offered by Mr. ADAMS, and under discussion yesterday, again coming up as the unfinished morning business,

Mr. HOFFMAN resumed the course of his remarks in reply to those of the mover, arguing to show that the resolutions were unnecessary, and were moreover offered too late to be of any service. He was authorized to say that the bill to reduce the duties on imports met the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury. If the gentleman should insist on his call, it would no doubt receive an answer, amounting in substance to what Mr. H. had just stated. The Secretary might perhaps suggest some slight modifications, but Mr. H. did not believe that a written answer to the call would be of any great importance to the House.

The second resolution called upon the President to furnish to the House a list of such articles as he considered indispensable to our independence in time of war, and it undertook to suppose that the President meant to declare that all protection must ultimately be limited to these articles alone. As all could read the message for themselves, and as his meaning was too clearly expressed to be well misunderstood, Mr. H. thought it sufficient to say that the President had uttered no such sentiment. Be that as it might, a discussion as to what the President's opinion was, could not, he should suppose, be very needful. Would the House of Representatives ask the President of the United States to furnish them with a list of articles which he deemed necessary in time of war? Could it be believed that that House would gravely, and in its legislative capacity, make such a call? Of what use could it be? How would it aid that House in the laying of taxes? How could a catalogue of such articles be very material to their legislation, in rendering the burden of taxation as little oppressive to the people as possible? When the President spoke of articles indispensably necessary in time of war, the general acceptance of his meaning would of course be, that he had reference to arms, and to the munitions of war. The gentleman from Massachusetts supposed that blankets were among these indispensable articles, but the judgement of the House, so far as blankets of a certain price were concerned, had put none under a duty of more than five per cent. He hoped that the judgment of the House, thus expressed, would enable the gentleman to arrive at a correct conclusion in respect to that particular article.

Mr. H. would not examine that reasoning, according to which it turned out that every variety of clothing and provisions, and all the ways and means by which each of those articles was made, constituted an essential in war. He should content himself with saying that the language used by the President was sufficiently plain and unequivocal. It related obviously to arms and munitions of war, to those things which were necessary only to military operations, and were not required by the civil wants of society. He thought, to say the least, that the House would not give any great evidence of its own sagacity by asking the President of the United States. He hoped, as well for the sake of the character of the House, and of respect to the Executive, as to the good sense of the country at large, that the call would be abandoned by the gentleman, and, if not, that it would be negatived by the House. He concluded by asking that the question be put upon the resolutions separately.

Mr. ADAMS observed that there seemed to be a general misunderstanding, both as to the object sought by the resolutions he had offered, and of the argument by which they had been sustained; and he found that the newspapers had contributed to sanction this mistake, and spread the misrepresentation through the country. By putting the word "might" in place of the word "must," in giving his second resolution, they had completely changed its whole meaning. The alteration of that single word occasioned a revolution in the whole subject; it gave a totally different bearing to the passage quoted from the President's message, as well as to his own resolution, and to his whole argument. The gentleman from New York had said that Mr. A. misunderstood the President. He judged of the President's meaning from the natural import of his words. His words were these:

"Those who take an enlarged view of the condition of our country, must be satisfied that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war."

This amounted to a nullifying and annihilating of the protective policy in this country. No protection whatever was ultimately to exist but upon articles indispensable in time of war. That was the sentiment expressed; if the gentleman could make any thing else of it, he was welcome. But that was the obvious and natural import of the words; and the only question presented to the House, and to the country, was, whether there should be protection, or whether there should be none.

Mr. A. had made this explanation only because he wished the House not to misunderstand the drift and intention of what he had said, in consequence either of what had fallen from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] or, what was of much more consequence to him, the misrepresentation (unintentional, he had no doubt) of the resolution he had offered, by inserting "might" instead of "must."

Mr. STEWART considered the second resolution as in a great measure superseded by the first: if the first should be fully answered by the Secretary, there could be little advantage in pressing the second. And besides, he believed the President had just now quite enough to do in giving his attention to other matters of a more grave and important character. He was in favor of making the call on the Secretary of the Treasury. The answer to that call would give the House some necessary light in voting on the bill, for they were not all in the condition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] who professed to have all the light that he needed to guide his vote. Besides, some little time ought to be afforded them before they were called on to act on a measure of such vital importance. The House had been urged by the gentleman from New York over the way, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] immediately to vote for a bill which subverted the whole policy, and overturned, uprooted, and destroyed the vital interests of this country—of the gentleman's country. He wished the gentleman would give them a little more light before he insisted on their action. Mr. S. would like to hear some reasons from the gentleman why that House was called upon so suddenly to repeal the act of the last session; an act which had passed in both Houses by a majority of two to one; an act for which all the States south of the Potomac, except two, had given a majority of their votes; an act which was agreed to on all sides as a final compromise of the claims and interests of the South and the North. This law they were now called on to repeal; to repeal it without a reason given; ay, and to do more, for a repeal of that law might amount to a virtual repeal of the Union. He advised gentlemen to retain the friends of the Union they now had, and not lose them in a vain attempt to conciliate others. If in that hopeless attempt they should disaffect the real friends of this Union, they might bring the Union itself into the greatest danger. The gentleman from New York on his left [Mr. HOFFMAN] affected to think there was no great need of discussion before passing this bill. Yes, that same gentleman who had voted for the tariff of 1828, who at that time had made a great ado, and had loudly demanded a high duty upon wool, seemed now to think that the less that was said about wool the better. He had light enough; he was ready to vote; inquiry was useless; discussion was mere waste of time. Now, for Mr. S.'s own part, he wanted a little more light, and he sincerely wished if the gentleman had so much, that he would at least impart some of it to the House: for his own part he confessed himself to be in Egyptian darkness as to the reasons for this measure. He saw that the gentleman shook his head when the part he had taken in favor of the high tariff of 1828 had been alluded to; yet all would bear him out in the assertion he had made, that that same gentleman had made a great ado on the subject of wool, and could scarce get a duty high enough. The gentleman was one of the most zealous, most ardent, most sincere; no, he would not say sincere, but certainly one of the most zealous advocates for protection: the farmers must be protected; wool was raised by the farmers; wool must be protected; it must be protected by a duty of a hundred per cent.; nothing less would be sufficient; wool was a product of agriculture. The gentleman was then a great friend of the agricultural interest. Pray, how came it to pass that the gentleman now had struck his flag? Not a word about wool, not a syllable about the protection of the agricultural interest; the whole doctrine must be given up, and, instead of the gentleman's hundred per cent. on wool, he was willing to cover it with a pitiful duty of fifteen per cent. now! What had wrought this change? Why was the gentleman's favorite interest now to be sacrificed? The gentleman was then quite indignant. What, import wool from England? Shocking! He was too much of an American to wear a coat that was made of foreign wool. But what said the gentleman now? He had light enough. He was ready and anxious to put wool at fifteen per cent. The Secretary of the Treasury had himself voted for the law of 1828. What had revolutionized that gentleman's views? He was now said to be in favor of this bill; yet he had ably advocated the whole policy, and the very measure he was now endeavoring to put down. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] had just said that this House had pronounced its judgment against blankets by reducing the duty to five per cent. Was that the judgment of the House? The gentleman knew better. He knew, and the House knew, that that reduction had been made as an act of concession. The duty of five per cent. on blankets never could have got a place in that bill but as an act of concession to the South. This important branch of industry, as well as the agriculture of the country, had been sacrificed as a peace-offering: was this the judgment of the House against blankets? If the gentleman doubted their being essential in time of war, let him look back to our last struggle with Great Britain, when Congress had been obliged to take off the non-intercourse with England in the midst of war, that we might get blankets for our perishing soldiers and our shivering Indians.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] had said that the House would manifest a great want of sagacity in calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information, when they were possessed of so much themselves. But Mr. S. thought they would show less in turning round and eating up, and swallowing down without chewing, the bill which they themselves had a few months since passed by a majority of two to one. And for what? No one knew: at least no one had pretended as yet to tell. He thought this would evince, if not a want of sagacity, at least a great want of consistency and firmness.

The professed object in view was to reduce the revenue. But on that subject Mr. S. concurred entirely in what had been advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Secretary had declared that the revenue might be reduced, by the amount of six millions of dollars, without prejudice to the just claims of existing establishments. The idea of effecting a certain reduction of revenue by a given reduction of duties, predicated on the imports of any one year, was utterly fallacious and delusive. The quantity and kind of imports were subject to immense fluctuations. For instance, in the year 1830, our imports had been 70 millions; and in the very next year they rose to 103 millions. How then could any calculations as to increase be based with safety on the results of any single year? Here was an increase of one-third in a single year. If gentlemen succeeded in reducing the duties as was proposed, he should not wonder if the revenue should be doubled for a short time. This standard of measure was perfectly fallacious; nor could the mere reduction of duties be relied upon to reduce the revenue. But there was a mode in which the Secretary might reduce the revenue without in the least affecting the principle of protection.

[Here Mr. CARSON interposed, and called Mr. STEWART to order.

Being desired by the Chair to state his point of order, Mr. CARSON said that the gentleman's plan for reducing the revenue had no connexion with the adoption of the resolution before the House. The gentleman had no right to forestall the Secretary of the Treasury on a question whether a certain resolution should be adopted.

The CHAIR replied that the nature of the resolution opened the whole subject for discussion.]

Mr. STEWART resumed. The gentleman from Massachusetts, he said, could not perceive how the revenue was to be reduced six millions by reducing the duties as proposed.

Here Mr. ADAMS asked leave to explain. He had not said that it was impossible to reduce the revenue by reducing imports; but what he had said was this: he was unable to see how the revenue was to be reduced six millions "without prejudice to the just claims of existing establishments." He did not see how the Secretary could carry into effect that which he said he could; and for that reason he had offered a resolution asking him how it was to be done—on what articles the reduction was to be made, so as not to prejudice these just claims.

Mr. STEWART proceeded, and observed that he concurred with his friend from Massachusetts, that the Secretary could not do this in the manner now proposed. But Mr. S. could tell the Secretary how the reduction might be effected without in the least prejudicing the protection of domestic industry, but, on the contrary, so as to advance and promote the interest of manufactures, increase the wealth, and establish the independence of the country. If he was asked what was the way to do this, he would reply, let the President or his Secretary first select the articles of necessity to the country in war, and such others as the country had the capacity of manufacturing for itself, such as iron, woollens, cottons, &c. Having selected these articles for permanent protection, then let him increase the duties gradually, till the foreign article was excluded, and this source of revenue thus entirely dried up. This was the way to reduce the revenue. To diminish the quantity of goods imported, not to increase it. Diminish it by raising duties, not increase it by lowering them; give full protection; say to capitalists, go to work, create a market, create competition, bring down prices. This was the true policy. Competition was the lever by which prices were to be brought down. Go on, fill the market; promote agriculture by furnishing a market for its products. Let the increase of duties be very gradual. If it rose by only two or three per cent. a year, it was sufficient. Only give security to capital. This was the way, and the only way, to decrease the revenue without prejudice to existing establishments. What had given our people cotton goods at so low a price? It was the operation of this very principle. It was the realizing of this very scheme. Cottons were the only article of domestic industry that were fully protected in 1816, and look at the result; last year the country had exported coarse cotton fabrics to the amount of a million and a quarter of dollars. Such were the effects of skill, and of the improvements in machinery. The same course applied to woollens would be followed by the same results. The country had as much capacity to manufacture one as the other. The same policy would be productive of the same effects. Indeed, woollens had increased more rapidly than cottons ever did, since their protection in 1824. The woollen manufacture was but eight years old in this country, while the cotton manufacture was of sixteen years standing. This was, in Mr. S.'s view, the true American policy.

Let the Secretary exclude imports, and he would add to the power and wealth of the country. Let him not reduce and destroy the interests of home industry, and check its progress. Agriculture and manufactures were mutually connected; they would both sink together under the system now brought forward by the gentleman from New York.

The Tariff Bill.

From the three articles of woollens, cottons, and iron, this country had, last year, derived a revenue of thirteen millions. The whole amount of goods we ought to have manufactured among ourselves. Of the thirty-seven millions worth of iron, woollens, and cottons imported, three-fourths, twenty-seven millions of its value at least, consisted of the labor, fuel, and subsistence of British workmen, and the productions of British farmers.

[Here the hour expired, and the debate was suspended.]

The House then went into Committee on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the subject of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. ROOT resumed the course of his remarks in favor of the bill, (as given above.) When he concluded,

Mr. VERPLANCK rose. He began by regretting the course which the discussion had taken; and that the opponents of the bill had not complied with the invitation he had given, at an early period, in behalf of the committee which had reported it. It was their wish to have taken up the bill, section by section, and item by item, so that upon any motion to amend, or any objection from any quarter, such defence or explanation as the occasion might call for, could be offered by the committee, and for this they were fully prepared. Unfortunately, as Mr. V. thought, for a fair consideration of this bill, a long, ardent, and desultory debate had been excited, by those who were adverse to its whole policy. In the discussion, upon a motion to strike out the duty on teas, the great principles which had been so often agitated in the present, as well as in many a former Congress, were again drawn into debate. In addition to this, almost every item of the bill had been touched upon in some way or other, and transiently attacked; woollens, and iron, and cottons, and tobacco, had their turn; and my distinguished colleague from New York, [Mr. Root,] whom I have known for years as the champion of wool, had just driven his flock of sheep down from his Delaware mountains into the throng of the debate.

It is difficult now to reply to all these objections in a manner to be of any practicable use in deciding these several points. They must, if we proceed in the bill, come up in detail, and the committee, if called upon, will then endeavor to show the grounds upon which the several rates in it have been fixed. How it was, for instance, that woollens, which it was said had been unreasonably reduced, in comparison with other articles, had, in fact, no small compensation for that difference, by a reduction of the duties on the raw material, oil, and dye stuffs. How it was, to take another instance, that the duty on tobacco, which had been complained of as an excessive protection of Southern interests, was, in fact, so purely nominal upon an article of which we exported five millions of dollars worth a year to foreign markets, that the committee had not thought it worth while to legislate specially about it, and had, therefore, left it subject to the operation of former laws. If any gentleman wished to introduce an amendment on this specific point, it would probably meet with but little opposition, and should it become part of a law, it would probably produce just as little effect.

Waiving all these details, as well as the discussion of those general principles of constitutional law and public policy, which would find a more appropriate place when the bill was reported to be finally acted upon in the House, if it should have that good fortune, Mr. V. said it was his intention to endeavor to come back to the question more immediately before us. He would, therefore, endeavor to reply to some of the objections which had the most direct and practical bearing upon the details of the bill. Among the most formidable of these, were the financial difficulties which had been so ingeniously raised by his able colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. INGRAMSOLL,] who had alone dissented from the report and bill presented by the rest of the committee.

The ground of the argument was this, that whether the plan of finance now proposed was good or bad, the present was not the time for financial reduction: that the treasury still required, for some years, the aid of the higher duties and large income provided for by the existing laws: that, in fact, at the expiration of the last year, the treasury was left not only empty, but subject to a heavy charge of debt, without the means to meet it.

It had been said, that, on the 1st January, 1833, the only remaining funds in the treasury were the million and a half which had, year after year, figured in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury as unavailable funds, consisting of the paper of broken State banks; whilst the treasury was still subject to various heavy demands. These were, first, seven millions of funded debt; next, about five millions and a half of unsatisfied appropriations, for various purposes, made during the last year; and, thirdly, about seven hundred thousand dollars, paid by the Government of Denmark as a compensation for spoliations on our commerce, which was merely a temporary deposit in our treasury, to be paid over to the merchants when their claims were adjusted.

Let us see, said Mr. V., how this matter stands. And, first, as to the funded debt. This the Committee of Ways and Means had considered, as they stated in their report, to be fairly liquidated, by setting off the stock owned by the Government in the Bank of the United States. This stock, at the market price, somewhat exceeded the present amount of the debt due by the nation. It also produced an interest, and was likely to do so, during the continuance of the Bank charter, of about one hundred and sixty thousand dollars annually, above the interest payable on the national debt.

It had been said that the Bank stock could not be sold without glutting the market; thus depreciating its value to the Government, and ruining individual stockholders. Certainly this might be done, if all branches of the Government were so disposed; but it was equally certain that it would not be done. It would be very easy to empower the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of this stock at a price not less than its true value, and under such restrictions as would prevent any fluctuations in the stock market, injurious to either public or private interests. The Bank itself might be authorized to purchase the stock, and it might be made the interest of that institution to do so, as enabling it to operate, for the remainder of its charter, upon smaller capital, and, consequently, with greater profits. What restrictions, as to the sale, might be necessary, would be for the wisdom of Congress to determine hereafter. But if, from any cause whatever, no such sale could be effected, still the funded debt unpaid was substantially provided for by the Bank stock. There was an income of nearly 500,000 dollars a year during the existence of the Bank charter, to meet the payment of the interest on the debt, amounting to less than three hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year; and, in the meanwhile, until the principal of the Bank stock was refunded, the payment of the debt might be anticipated, and extinguished, in whole or in part, by the application of such balances as would remain in the treasury at the end of each year. For I think it may be made to appear that, in all human probability, under the operation of this bill, should it become a law, there will be such balances remaining unexpended in the treasury. Here, then, there is no debt unprovided for, at which the most timid political economist need be alarmed.

The second difficulty raised is of a more plausible character. I mean that founded on the unsatisfied appropriations for former years. Of the moneys appropriated during 1832, for the service of that year, there are still five millions and a half of unsatisfied appropriations. These are debts, it is said, for which the nation is liable; that we owe the money; that there can be no higher claim than an appropriation by Congress; that we should be always ready to meet these demands, however and whenever they come; and that the treasury is not now in a state to do so.

Let us again look at the true state of the case. Thirty years' experience, during peace and war, has shown us that there are, of necessity, in every financial year, certain portions of the appropriations which will not only not be paid during that year, but, in fact, from the mode of expenditure, can never be payable until late in the next. These are of various kinds, and it would weary the patience of the committee were I to enumerate them all. A considerable proportion of them are in the naval service. A large amount of the sum appropriated for the gradual increase of the navy, is applied to contracts for cannon, copper, and other materials, and for frames for frigates and seventy-fours. These contracts, of course, take a considerable time, often a year or more, for their completion, and the payments are consequently deferred until that period. So in the large annual appropriations for pay afloat in the navy, two-thirds, on an average, of such appropriations, applicable to distant squadrons, is never payable until their return to the United States. So also in contracts for the army, for cannon, provisions, clothing, &c., the money is not payable until the contract is fulfilled, and a large proportion of these are not payable until a year after the nominal appropriation is made. Thus, a portion of the actual appropriations of every year are but nominal debts during that year, and remain so until they become earned and payable in a succeeding one. Some portion of this is never earned or expended, and after two years returns to the general fund, by being passed, in the books of the treasury, to what is called the surplus fund. There are also, of course, some portions of the appropriations which, from less fixed and regular causes, are either not payable or not claimed until more than a year after such appropriation. Thus there are always, and have been uninterruptedly, for many years, and must always be, some three, four, or five millions of the sums appropriated in each year, actually chargeable upon the income received during the next.

It is due to candor to allow that, owing to the protracted session of the last summer, and the late period at which some of the appropriation bills passed, this amount is something greater than usual during the present year. But it is asked, is it not the part of a prudent statesman to keep always a sum in the treasury to meet these demands, which will certainly come at some time or other? Would not every prudent man do so in regard to his own affairs? Would such a man trust to contingencies to meet demands which he knows must be paid in three, six, or nine months? Certainly he would not. Neither does the Treasury of the United States. Nor yet is it obliged to keep a large sum of money lying unemployed, and for this simple reason: if there is always a certain amount of the appropriation of one year remaining to be paid in the next, there is also always a much larger amount of revenue earned in the one year, which, in consequence of our credit system of revenue, is not paid until the next. Under the former system of long credits, which is still partly in operation, two-thirds of the revenue earned in any one year, and secured by the best commercial security, falls due in one year, and is paid in the next. Under the shorter credits of the act of 1832, this proportion is altered; about one-half falling due within the year of importation, the other half in the next. Many years of custom-house experience have shown us that these securities are perfectly to be relied upon; and that even during the most disastrous periods of trade, the losses to Government are trifling in the extreme. In the present year, it so happens that, to meet the five millions and a half of the unsatisfied appropriations of 1832, there is a nett revenue accruing from the custom-house bonds, given in 1832, and actually falling due weekly and daily during the present year, amounting to fifteen million six hundred thousand dollars. Would any prudent man, in private life, under similar circumstances, consider his debts unprovided for? Ought any statesman, under such circumstances, wish to tax the people for the sake of accumulating money in the treasury? The policy of storing up treasures of gold and silver, for future uses, is that of a past age. We now live in what one of our own poets, who is a man of business as well as a poet, has happily termed "a bank note world," in which, though there is doubtless too much paper, yet the place of Government hoards of old gold and silver is well and safely supplied by commercial securities or custom-house bonds and deposits. This is no new doctrine: it is the settled policy of our Government. It was originally recommended and enforced by the late Mr. Lowndes, and was finally and fully carried into effect by an act passed about four years ago, repealing the old provisions for keeping a surplus in the treasury, and authorizing the head of that department to apply, at his discretion, the whole of the unexpended balances, at the end of each year, to the payment of the public debt. It is by the judicious exercise of this power that the extinction of the debt has been so rapidly hastened.

Let us now, leaving these general views of the subject, see their results in an estimate of the revenue and expenditure for the next year, under the contemplated tariff.

The nett revenue actually accruing from the importation of 1832, is calculated at $23,500,000, of which two-thirds falls due and will be received in 1833,	$15,660,000
The two first months of 1833, under the present tariff, at the same rate of importation, would produce	$3,915,000
We will deduct fifteen per cent., say	586,000
	3,329,000
	$18,989,000
Deduct, for return duties, under the eighteenth section of the act of 1832, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury,	2,500,000
	$16,489,000
Add nett duties accruing in the remainder of 1833, which, under the proposed bill, would be $13,840,834. For greater safety, let us again deduct fifteen per cent., say $2,076,124; this would leave $11,766,000; one-half of which, accruing under the present credit system, during the present year, would be	5,882,000
	Leaving as the nett revenue from the customs for that year,
Add public lands, bank dividends, &c.	$22,371,000
	3,000,000
	$25,371,000
For the amount of all estimated appropriations for the year 1833, including the Danish claims, and the large arrearages of revolutionary pensions, deduct	18,330,000
	Leaving a balance of
	$7,041,000

The Thrift Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Which would extinguish the unsatisfied appropriations of the last year, and pay off all those, if required, of the present year, leaving a balance of a million and a half for extraordinary appropriations of the present year. But, as, in point of fact, there will be, for reasons already assigned, some three or four millions of this year's appropriations payable in the next, there will be a balance to that amount left in the treasury at the end of the year, and, unless some arrangement before that time be made in relation to the bank stock, I know not how it can be better applied than by paying off the two million two hundred and twenty-seven thousand of four and a half per cent. stock reimbursable on the 1st of January, 1834. There would even then be room for a reduction for our calculation of revenue, or under calculation of receipts, of about two millions of dollars.

If we proceed to the next year, we will find the accounts standing still more favorably; that is, of course, presuming that our relations of peace and tranquillity remain uninterrupted.

In 1834, under the new short credit system, one-half the duties accruing in 1833 will be payable. These, if calculated upon an importation of either 1831 or 1832, according to the rates of the present bill, would amount to	$8,300,000
Half of those of the same year, calculated according to the operation of this bill, on the same amount of importation, falling due within the year, would amount to	7,200,000

Making an aggregate from the customs, of $15,500,000

This is, I frankly allow, more than the revenue which is likely to accrue, under a gradually diminishing rate of impost. But, I presume, all objections on that score will be obviated by allowing a deduction of twenty per cent. or one-fifth from this amount, which leaves accruing from the customs, for that year, -	$12,400,000
To this we may add, from the other resources of the treasury, -	3,000,000

Thus we have about fifteen millions and a half of dollars for the income of the year 1834. In that year, the claims on the treasury for the Danish indemnities, for the extra appropriations of the year 1832, and for the back pay of the new revolutionary pensioners, which have so much swelled the expenses of the present year, will have been paid off, and there will only remain the ordinary claims upon the treasury, which have been admitted on all sides of the House ought not to exceed fifteen millions of dollars. We have, therefore, some surplus to apply to the public debt, if the proceeds of the bank stock shall not have already extinguished it. Then begin the regular operations of the bill, calculated, with other resources, to raise a revenue of about fifteen millions to meet an expenditure generally below that sum.

The next objection raised is, that it is taken for granted that the income of the public lands is still to remain as a portion of the revenue of the country. Now, it is said, a plan has been recommended by the Executive, and a bill adopting another plan has passed the Senate, either of which would divert the whole of this income into another channel. The Committee of Ways and Means have, of course, taken it for granted, that until some law on this subject has actually passed, the present system will continue for a time. Indeed, while the propositions of those who think it proper to apply this fund to other objects than those subject to our own legislation are so variant, it is wholly uncertain what plan, and where any can be adopted, differing from the present system. Still the committee have endeavored to guard, in several ways, against making their whole plan of finance dependent upon the continuance of the present land system.

In the first place, they have thought that the revolutionary pensions being now put upon the footing, not of bounty, but of the payment of revolutionary debt, (for which the public lands were so often pledged as security,) that the income from this source might well be appropriated, for a time, to the discharge of such pensions. This appropriation would not last long; for, although I hope and trust that very many of the soldiers of the revolution will continue long to enjoy this late and tardy recompense for their services, yet, according to the laws of nature, the aggregate number must very rapidly diminish. Above one-third of them, as I learn from an actual return from the Pension Office, laid before the Committee of Ways and Means for a different purpose, are over the age of seventy-five years, and nine-tenths of them are over seventy. It is therefore certain, according to the probabilities of human life, that although some of these annuities may continue for very many years, yet the great mass of them must shortly terminate.

I will observe, by the way, that it was with reference to this circumstance, that the estimate of two millions a year for all the revolutionary pensioners has been adopted by the committee. This has been noted as a gross error by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNA], because a report from the Pension Office states the amount now to be something above two millions and a half a year. A surplus revenue has been allowed to meet the small excess of the present charge, and it is a matter of strict calculation according to those general laws as to the probability of human life, which, on a large scale, never fail, that this annuity upon such ages diminishes by so rapid and regular a decrease every year, that two millions will be more than the average required for the next six years.

To return, then; this annual payment, by the stern and unsparing laws of nature, diminishes so rapidly that, at the end of a very few years, the treasury may easily spare the whole of the proceeds of the public lands. But the legislation of Congress may, perhaps, be more speedy, and divert this fund to other objects at a much earlier period. That event the committee have also endeavored to anticipate and obviate. It is presumed, in the first place, that if the income of these lands is taken away from the treasury, it will be taken, as the lawyers say, cum onere, that is to say, subject to the burdens necessarily belonging to it: these are, the cost of the sales and surveys of the land, and the Indian annuities regularly paid as the consideration of their purchase, amounting to more than half a million of dollars a year. One of the objects to which this money is to be applied by the States to whom it is contemplated to be granted, is internal improvements. If the States assume this expense, the General Government will be relieved from it, and this has generally amounted to about a million of dollars a year. Thus far, then, if the public lands are taken away, while our revenue will be diminished, our expenditure will also be diminished, though in a less proportion, leaving a deficiency to be supplied from some other source. This the committee have endeavored to do, by increasing or restoring the duties on silks, tea, and coffee, which might not otherwise have been wanted.

I shall now come to another class of objections. These are in regard to the amount of revenue to be derived from this bill. It is indeed difficult to reply to all these. They remind me of the story told of (I think) Dean Swift, who once asked an acquaintance, "Did you ever find any good weather in the course of your life?" The other replied, "Yes, thank heaven! a great deal."

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

"Now," said the cynical wit, "I never did; I have always found it too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry." Our poor bill has met with even harder censures than that of Swift upon the weather. It is not only too hot or too cold, too wet and too dry, too high and too low alternately, but all of them at the same time. One gentleman undertakes to prove that it will leave the treasury naked, bare, and desolate as the sea shore at low water, while others pledge themselves to prove that it will bring in such a tide of importation, as will sweep away all the manufactories, and fill the treasury to overflowing.

To all this I have only to reply, that the committee, in their estimates, may have erred somewhat on one side or the other, but that these estimates were not arbitrarily assumed, but were grounded upon well known general laws of importation, consumption, and increase of population, which, like the calculations of insurance or annuities, may fail, in special cases, or in any given year, but always hold good in the main. They have made a calculation of the effect of their bill upon the actual importation of a certain year, that of 1831, for they thought that this would produce a more certain and practical result than could be obtained in any other way. This, it is true, was a year of higher importation than ordinary, though about the same as that of 1832. The committee believed that this excess over the average of former years, though it might perhaps fall short in this or the next year, would not fall short of the average of several years to come, taken together, under the operations of the new bill. They have stated their reasons for this in their report, and I need not minutely recapitulate them. Every year gives us an increase of population as well as wealth, and a consequent increase of consumption, and the means to pay for foreign goods by our own manufactures, or products of the soil, fitted for foreign export.

In the next place, the consumers are free from an amount of ten or twelve millions a year, which have been heretofore levied in duties upon the people, and remitted abroad in payment of the principal and interest of our debt. This will, hereafter, be returned to our own shores in various commodities, some of utility, and some of luxury, according to the demands of the people. The reduction of several almost prohibitory duties will also promote an increased importation. All these causes, it is confidently believed, will raise the average annual importation for several successive years hereafter, to the amount, and perhaps above the amount, assumed by the committee. But it does not, therefore, follow that this increase will be excessive and enormous, or will swell up to an indefinite extent. What we buy we must pay for; and the value of our imports must be regulated by that of our exports, including profits of trade and navigation. All these may be considerably increased by a wiser and milder revenue system, but certainly not to an indefinite extent.

As an example of the operation of this bill upon the increase of importation, let us take two or three prominent articles. Iron, for instance. The great mass of this article, consumed in this country, especially in the interior, is of domestic product, and securely protected from much foreign competition by the mere cost of transportation. But the commoner qualities of the rolled English iron, which answers for ordinary smith's work, and no other purpose, are so very cheap, in spite of the high duties, that it supplies a great part of the consumption of the whole of our Atlantic coast and cities, North and South. It is not fit for more valuable purposes, and a diminution of the duties will increase its consumption but very little. The better sort of hammered iron from the North of Europe, on the other hand, is used for machinery, steam engines, shipbuilding, &c., and as much as is wanted for such purposes must be had at any price. Of these two qualities of iron, the best and worst, a diminution of duties would not much increase the consumption, and would, in fact, be a diminution of revenue; and between these two comes the better sort of English rolled iron, which is now nearly or wholly excluded from our consumption, by the high duties. Under diminished duties, some of this would be imported for the consumption of the cities and the Atlantic coast, though it is not probable that it would much affect the market of the interior. Thus the treasury would gain something by a diminished duty on one kind of iron, while it would lose by a diminution on the best and worse sorts.

Thus, again, in cotton goods. The very cheap qualities, forming the mass of our consumption, are protected, by the cheapness of their production, from any serious competition of foreign importation here, under even a low rate of duty. The finer sorts of cotton goods, that is to say, those above fifteen cents a yard, are already imported to the amount of five or six millions a year, in spite of the operation of the present minimum system, and a diminution of duties would not probably increase the revenue. The importation might be increased, but not more than to make up the difference of duties. The main operation of the proposed change will be, the admitting certain cotton goods between the two classes I have mentioned. The revenue then, from cotton goods, I believe, will stand pretty much as at present.

On the article of spirits, I presume the revenue will be increased; but it will be because it will increase the exportation of our agricultural products. If more of this article is imported, more provisions, flour, corn meal, butter and cheese, &c. will be exported to the West Indies. Here will be some increase of income, notwithstanding a considerable diminution of duty.

In going over the items of the bill, similar results, none of them precisely accurate, though all of them probable, lead to the conclusion that the estimate presented by the committee cannot be very far from the fact. As they do not claim to be prophets in political economy, this is all the respect they can ask for their estimates. They have been accused of having been precipitate in preparing the bill, without documents or information. They can only say that they have been, individually, for a year and a half, during the present Congress, to say nothing of preceding experience, doing little else than looking at the tariff in different lights, reading documents about it, and hearing arguments. They had all the information which enabled the late Committee on Manufactures and the Secretary of the Treasury, last year, to prepare and present their bill; and they believed a good deal more. If they had been, as had been accurately calculated by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, but eighteen days in preparing their bill, as a committee, it was because they had been eighteen months in studying the subject beforehand.

We have not, however, the vanity to presume that we have framed a perfect bill. We have no pride of opinion on this subject that can prevent us from listening with pleasure to any suggestions intended not to destroy, but to improve the bill; and if good reasons are shown for so doing, we are willing to accept any amendments which may make the language of the bill more clear, precise, or comprehensive, which will proportion the duties more justly, or which will adjust more equitably the several periods of the gradual reduction. All that we claim of this House is, that the bill should be received in the same spirit of frankness in which it is presented, and not assailed with vague and contradictory objections, without the offer of any better plan of impost, either in whole or in part.

I have at last reached, after wandering through this wilderness of objection, the immediate question now before us, and this relates to the duty on tea and coffee.

JAN. 18, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

These duties, if very moderate, are, in fact, just in themselves. For they are very much in the nature of a direct tax, being upon objects of general consumption, and, at the same time, bear more lightly, in proportion, on the poor than on the wealthy. Averaging the aggregate consumption of tea throughout the nation, it is about half a pound a head a year, and of coffee about two pounds. Every housekeeper in affluence, or even easy circumstances, knows that his own consumption is in a much greater proportion.

I can boast having always been a friend, and on one occasion an efficient friend, to the importers as well as to the consumers of those innocent luxuries. The duties some years ago were a hundred per cent. upon the cost of these articles, and I can look back with pleasure to the part which I bore as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, in a former Congress, in reducing them to one-third of their former rates. The duties now proposed are still lower, and, as the committee proposes to amend them, not more than sixteen or eighteen per cent. These duties have been added, as I before suggested, as a precaution against any deficiency of the revenue from the withdrawal of the proceeds of the lands, or any other cause whatever. I will also add, for the satisfaction of one of my Connecticut friends, [Mr. ELLSWORTH,] who questioned me on that point, that they were added on the protective principle. They were put in to secure sufficient revenue in any case, but if that revenue were too much, that then, either these duties might be repealed, or else these, together with all others, uniformly diminished, by a small reduction, spread over many articles. In either case, avoiding the hazard of any large and unexpected reduction of any product or manufacture, which may, as I believe most will, be efficiently protected under this proposed revenue tariff.

I intended here to close these desultory observations and explanations, postponing the defence of other details of the bill until we reach them in regular order, or leaving them to the support of my colleagues of the Committee of Ways and Means. But there is one other topic that I cannot wholly pass over. Still I mean to speak of it but briefly.

We have heard, in the course of this discussion, from various quarters, that this bill for reducing the revenue and the duties on imports, was not called for from any large portion of the people; that it was prompted and dictated by the menacing attitude of South Carolina; that that menacing attitude alone was a sufficient reason why this bill should not now pass. It has been called a measure of concession to South Carolina. I think, too, I heard it termed a measure of submission. We were told by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNA,] that, in presenting this bill, "the Committee of Ways and Means had taken counsel only of their fears."

Fears! Mr. Chairman—fears! Let us not be deceived by the sound of words. This same word, fear, has various and widely differing meanings. Personal fear is a miserable weakness. It degrades the individual, rendering him useless to himself and to others, in the noblest acts and most precious duties of life. Political cowardice is just as hurtful and despicable in a higher sphere and a wider range of influence. But this sort of cowardice springs always from base and narrow selfishness; from the little, dirty, personal motives of small politicians, whether in high or low stations. And it is in its trembling anxiety to guard or gain petty interests, or attain petty ends, that it betrays or sacrifices the public weal. I cannot for a moment insult my worthy high-minded colleagues on the committee, by thinking it possible that such a cowardice had for a moment influenced their decisions. I should blush for myself if it had ever mastered my own thoughts for a moment.

There are, however, other fears of a different sort. There may be a fear of taxing the citizen to enrich the treasury, and a fear of weakening the bonds of union, the strongest bonds of union—the bonds of willing hearts, the feelings of loyal attachment to this Government, by unnecessary taxation. Fears for the public peace—fears not of any present danger, but for the permanent stability of our constitution. For such fears, in myself or in my friends, I cannot blush.

What now is the true state of the case, in regard to the motives which may have led to the recommendation and introduction of this bill, and which may justify its now passing into a law?

We have arrived at a period in the financial history of our Union, when we can still further, and without hazard, diminish the revenue and lighten the taxation, direct and indirect, of the whole people. Against the continuance of some of these burdens seven States of our confederacy have more than once (and some of them again, within a month or two) remonstrated as oppressive and unconstitutional. Large classes and numerous bodies of citizens in other portions of the country, together with, I believe, two of our Northern States in their sovereign capacity, (New Hampshire and Maine,) have re-echoed this complaint, though with an important variation. They have said that such taxes were not unconstitutional, but oppressive and unjust. Be it that these complaints were quite unfounded. Be it that the laws were constitutional. I have myself held and avowed the latter opinion. Be it that the duties were equal, just, and, when wanted for the treasury, useful. Still, the firm and deep-rooted conviction, not of South Carolina alone, but of nearly the whole South, and of thousands of citizens throughout the Northern and navigating States, is that which they have so often urged upon us. They think themselves oppressed. Shall, then, the majority of this people continue to impose upon the minority, (and a large minority too,) even for another year, burdens which that minority believe to be oppressive; and this for the sake of collecting taxes which are no longer needed? Is this right? Is it just? Is it wise and statesmanlike? Is it even prudent?

I grant—no one can do it more willingly—that this Government has the constitutional power to impose these duties, and the actual power to retain and enforce them. What then? Because we may have a giant's strength, does it become us to use it like a giant? What is true of all civil power, is especially and peculiarly true of our federal legislation. If we would have it work much good and no evil; if we wish it to last long, and command willing obedience, it must be exercised moderately, kindly, gently. But if, from the fear of growing weak, we insist upon our Government's constantly putting forth its whole strength, we shall at last find that strength perish in the using.

Above all, is it right, just, wise, or magnanimous, to refuse relief craved from our hands, constitutionally, respectfully, patiently, by so many States, by so many thousands of citizens, merely because harsher and sterner demands for larger concessions are made from another quarter?

To do so would be indeed to "take counsel of our fears"—and a fear, too, of the worst kind; it is the fear of doing right, lest we should, in some way or other, degrade ourselves in doing it. I have often seen this weakness in social life, and have sometimes deplored it as an infirmity of a noble mind. But it is oftener the accompaniment of pride, weakness, passion, or folly. It is the offspring of a false and spurious honor, which the wise man condemns, over which the good man may mourn, but which the truly brave must despise. Its mischiefs are enormous, incalculable. It perpetuates quarrels that should have passed away with the temporary cause, and reduced that amount by this bill. In point of fact, this very bill, this new experiment of the Committee of Ways and Means, was itself an additional reason for making the call. Mr. A. wanted to know whether this really was the bill that was expected thus to reduce the revenue.

H. or R.]

At this point the hour for resolutions expired, and the debate was suspended.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, said that, if the committee were now prepared to take the question upon the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HURT-LETON,] to strike out the duty upon teas and coffee, he would waive his claim to the floor, and permit the vote to be taken. If they were not, he should proceed to express his opinion upon the merits of the bill. Differing, as he did, from the friends of the protective system on several essential points which had been urged in the course of the discussion, and agreeing with the Committee of Ways and Means in many of the general views presented in their report, he should make no apology for asking the attention of the committee for a few moments.

Mr. J. said it was apparent to all, that we had arrived at a crisis momentous in the affairs of this nation. The public debt was about to be extinguished; the duties on imports reduced to a revenue standard; and such a financial system adopted, as may restore peace and harmony to the country.

To accomplish objects so desirable, Mr. J. felt assured that there could not be an individual in that House who would not yield something; for himself he was prepared to go far, very far indeed, to yield preconceived opinions upon the much vexed and vexing subject of the tariff, in adopting such a course of legislation as would reconcile conflicting interests; satisfy, if possible, the divisions among us; and promote a kinder and better feeling between different sections of the Union. In doing this, he should not be deterred, lest he might be supposed to sanction the doctrines of nullification, or not sufficiently advocate those of the proclamation. Mr. J. regretted the introduction of those topics at the present time; nor did he view them as necessary to a satisfactory adjustment of the tariff; and, although other gentlemen had, in the course of this debate, felt themselves called on to denounce the one and applaud the other, he did not look upon this as the proper occasion for the discussion of those subjects, more especially as, no doubt, an opportunity would be afforded in due season by the committee who have them in charge: for, "sufficient for the day will be the evil thereof," when this or any future Congress shall have to decide between the danger of nullification and consolidation; and still more to be deplored that hour, when the doctrines of either shall have to be enforced at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. J. said he did not consider it good policy in the friends of protection, in the existing state of excitement throughout the country, to urge the continuation of higher duties, or to a longer period, than was indispensably necessary to save from disaster the great interests which had grown up under it. He considered the period fast approaching, when the people of the country expected, and would demand, a reduction of the revenue to the proper expenditures of the Government. Was it not wise, then, to provide in time for a state of things which sooner or later must arrive?

Mr. J. said he did not agree with the friends of the tariff, that laws passed for protection necessarily implied an indefinite continuation of them; or that a reduction or repeal of the duties, as had been assumed, would be a "violation of the plighted faith of the nation." Were he to admit those premises, he should come to the conclusion that an increase of the duties was an equal violation.

When the tariff laws of 1816 were enacted, the friends of protection no doubt looked for, and had a right to expect, a continuation of those duties until the manufactures to be grown up under them were beyond the reach of contingency. But the opponents of the system never imagined that an increase of those duties was contemplated. The error seems to have been, that both parties have looked more to individual and sectional interest, than to that of the community at large.

The principle is certainly correct, that no law, whether for increase or reduction of duties, for revenue or protection, or any other object, should be continued longer than the interests of the country demand it. It is, therefore, a question of general expediency alone, whether those laws should be changed, and at what time such change should be made. And here Mr. J. said he concurred with the Committee of Ways and Means in that part of the report where they say that "the extinguishment of the public debt, and the commencement of the new Presidential term, make this a fit season for permanent fiscal regulations." It is vitally important, too, to all engaged in any of those numerous commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural enterprises, which are affected by changes in the rates of imposts, and are more exposed to suffer from uncertainty than even error in legislation, now to know the intention and policy of this Government in regard to their several interests. The occasion of economical reduction affords a propitious opportunity to make such a readjustment of the rates of impost as may distribute and equalize, amongst all, those burdens which may be found to fall unequally upon any.

The report of the committee contains several important propositions:

1st. A reduction of the revenue to the proper expenditures of the Government.

2d. An equal distribution of duties, so that none may have a right to complain.

3d. A readjustment of the rates of impost, as may distribute and equalize, amongst all, those burdens which may be found to fall unequally upon any.

And we are presented with a bill, which, if adopted, the committee say, "may serve as a basis for a financial system for many years."

Mr. J. expressed his approbation of the general views embraced in the report, and should not now urge any objection whatever, except as related to the public domain, to which the committee had briefly referred. That subject, he hoped, would be, by the present Congress, so disposed of, that all the States would be placed upon a fair and equitable footing. It was one in which they were all greatly interested, and none more so than the State which he, in part, represented on that floor. He believed that, to a fair and just distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, whatever importance may have been attached to other subjects, would ultimately depend the perpetuity of this Union. As the subject, however, had not yet come up from the committee especially entrusted with it, he should forbear any further remarks until it was under the consideration of the House.

Mr. J. said that, if he could believe that the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means could realize the fair language of the report, he should take it as it was, however apparent its defects. The bright prospects held out in the report, would, if realized, ensure permanency to our laws, establish confidence in our legislation, and afford a security that we were acting for the benefit of the whole, and not for the preservation of particular interests, to the injury of others; not for the relief of one section of the Union, to the ruin of another.

How far the bill was calculated to accomplish these desirable objects; how far "the rates of impost are equally distributed amongst all;" how long it is like to "serve as a basis for a financial system;" and to whom it may prove satisfactory, may be conjectured by an examination of its details. Let us look at our present position. A law passed by the present Congress, at its last session, as late as the month of July, "regulating the duties upon imports;" a law which occupied the almost exclusive attention of able committees, in both Houses, for several months; which committees had before them the reports of, and facts collected by, two conventions, composed of men of the best practical talents of our country, with such further facts as they deemed it proper to obtain, together with all the lights that could emanate from the Treasury Department; a law reducing the revenue some six or eight millions of dollars, not yet gone into operation, is proposed to be virtually repealed, and by a bill which could not have been before the Committee of Ways and Means more than sixteen or twenty days, and which is proposed as the "basis" of a permanent financial system. Has the law of last session no claim to the favorable consideration of the committee, at least as a "basis for a financial system?"

The great anxiety felt throughout the country, upon the subject, had called the attention of both the friends and opponents of the tariff to their then conflicting opinions, and which gave rise to the two conventions of 1831, held at New York and Philadelphia, before adverted to.

The Representatives here, having the benefit of the results of those conventions; the reports of their own committees; the developments of the views of the Secretary of the Treasury, after bestowing upon the subject unprecedented time, labor, and talent, discussing every item at large, passed the act of July last, in which much concession was made to preserve the peace and quiet of the country, by a vote of this House of 132 to 65, being a majority of 67.

In the Senate, the vote stood upon its final passage, 32 to 16.

The act was approved by the Executive, and, as far as we can judge, sanctioned by the people of the United States. The presses throughout the country, except in a certain section, and more particularly those presses favorable to the administration, lauded the great reduction of the revenue as effected by that law.

Can it be expected that any law involving so much interest, the principles of which have been so long contested, will ever attain a larger vote than the act of July last? Would not this, then, have been a much more satisfactory "basis" for reduction of the revenue, than the present bill? The committee propose to reduce the revenue to fifteen millions of dollars annually, taking that amount as necessary to meet the liberal wants of the Government.

To this Mr. J. saw no objection; he presumed that the committee had correctly informed themselves what amount of revenue was required by the Government, and he was willing to take $15,000,000 as the revenue standard. Why not, then, lay a gradual prospective reduction, equal in its operation upon the duties under the law of 1832, until the revenue was brought down to $15,000,000? This would meet the only principle contained in the present bill, to wit, reduction; if there were any other principle in it, it had escaped his notice. The following list will show how the bill "equalizes the duties on imports," and how equally the rates of impost are distributed.

Mr. J. said he would call the attention of the committee to a statement of some of the rates of duty under the bill before the House, to March, 1834, to March, 1835, and after the 2d of March, 1835.

Permanent duty.

Special duty.

Lace goods of all kinds, gold and silver articles, and pearl, at a duty of seven and a half per cent. And this is what the committee call in their report, "an equal distribution of the rates of impost."

While woolens, after March, 1835, will be imported under a permanent duty of five and fifteen per cent.; coarse blankets at five per cent.; cottons from ten to twenty per cent.; manufactures of flax, hemp, and sail duck at fifteen per cent.; those articles which are consumed to a large amount in the production of those manufactures, such as brown sugar, tea, coffee, salt, and molasses, are taxed from thirteen to forty-six per cent.; iron and coal ranging from forty-seven to ninety-three per cent., a permanent specific duty. Is this inequality calculated to give satisfaction, or is the bill such a one as we had a right to expect from the report? Will the country be satisfied to take this as a permanent system? Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Louisiana may. It is very certain the North and East cannot. The planters and farmers of the South and West must first be convinced that it is right, in the fiscal arrangements of the Government, that one class of articles should be taxed at an average duty of more than seventy-five per cent., such as iron, and another class equally entitled to protection, at a general average of ten per cent., before they can give their sanction to this mode of equalization of duties as a permanent system. Who then will be satisfied? New York, provided she ensures by it the accomplishment of her ulterior object.

Why is it that luxuries of limited use, such as laces, gold and silver articles, and those of pearl, should be permitted to come in under a duty of seven and a half per cent., while you impose a permanent average duty of more than twenty per cent. upon those articles of universal consumption, teas and coffee, and which do not come in competition with American industry? Mr. J. said he detested the use of "ad captandum" arguments in any deliberative body. But, sir, there are details which cannot be avoided; the examination of which clearly show that the bill in its present form will not accomplish the object professed in the report. The honorable chairman, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] who so feelingly addressed the committee, asks us, "Shall we refuse to release seven or nine of the States from the burdens of which they complain?"

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. J. said, certainly not; but in thus relieving that portion of our fellow-citizens who do complain, let us not inflict injuries upon others, for which they may have just cause of complaint. You propose to change your laws, because they act unequally and oppressively upon one section of the Union, and advise the enactment of such as must bring disaster and ruin upon another. Our Southern friends never contemplated so unjust, so reckless a remedy. They do not expect that those great interests which they have at least been accessory to raising up to their present state of prosperity, should at one fell swoop be prostrated forever. It is not in their generous nature to desire it. They would not deserve to be countenanced if they did. No, sir, they ask for a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, for an equal distribution of the burdens as well as the benefits; and not for a bill that gives full and adequate protection to certain classes of articles, and lays low the interests of the manufactures of others. The honorable chairman [Mr. VERPLANCK] tells us that "iron is already protected in many sections of country from the charges and difficulty of transportation." Why, then, said Mr. J., add to the price by increasing the burdens? "Rolled iron," the chairman continues, "is principally used for certain purposes, in the cities and upon the Eastern seacoast."

But, sir, bar iron is an article of universal consumption for agricultural purposes, and a permanent specific duty of seventy-six per cent. is imposed upon its importation, for the purpose, I suppose, of "equalizing the burdens" upon the planters and farmers. The member of the committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILMORE] assigns another reason for the high duty upon iron, which is, that "iron is an article of universal consumption in civilized life, and, therefore, should be protected."

Does the protection upon iron lessen the price? If so, extend protection to the woollens, to the cottons, to the linens, and all other articles of similar usefulness, and let us have them equally cheap. Does it enhance the price? Then reduce the duty, and let that which is consumed by every family in the United States, and is an indispensable necessary of life, be obtained upon the best possible terms, and collect your duties upon articles of less necessity.

"The effect of the reduction of duties upon cottons is only a reduction of the revenue," so says the honorable chairman, but admits that, "under the proposed bill, there will be a considerable increase of imported articles of manufacture." If there should be an increase of the imported article, there must be a correspondent decrease of the domestic manufacture. And why should there be an increase of the one, or decrease of the other, unless the reduction of the duty has an effect upon the price? Mr. J. said he was unable to see how the honorable chairman arrived at his conclusions. The member of the committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILMORE] assures us that "woollens and cottons can be manufactured as cheap in this country as in Europe," and that "the duty on imported wool has no effect upon domestic wool," and had read to us voluminous letters to prove his position. Mr. J. said it was a little strange that the same conviction had not been wrought in the mind of the honorable member when the tariff was under discussion at the last session: for his votes, if they were indicative of his opinion, stood against the reduction of the duties to the standard of the present bill upon wool, cottons, and woollens, notwithstanding the honorable member then had the benefit of all the letters and documents to which he has referred us, and to which he seems to attribute his change of opinion. But "tempora mutantur;" and, although the honorable member has "no doubt but that the reduction of the revenue as proposed in the bill will create considerable embarrassment and distress to the interests concerned," still he is willing to pass it without amendment.

The gentleman from New York, not of the committee, [Mr. HOFFMAN, informed us the other day that "the Secretary of the Treasury approves the bill"—be it so; but, if the gentleman from New York is not mistaken in giving us this information, it only shows that the learned Secretary, like many others, takes the liberty of changing his opinion at very brief intervals. It was no longer than December last, in his annual report on the finances, that the Secretary, referring to his former recommendations of a reduction of the duties to the revenue standard, remarked: "In the reduction then recommended, the necessity of adapting the proposed changes to the safety of existing establishments, raised up under the auspices of past legislation, and deeply involving the interests of a large portion of the Union, was distinctly recognised; and it is still deemed to be not less imperious, in the further changes which may be considered expedient." Can the Secretary believe that the changes proposed by the bill, which his friend from New York says he approves, "are adapted to the safety of existing establishments;" or that woollens, and cottons, and linens, which have been raised up under the auspices of past legislation, can sustain themselves against foreign competition under a duty of five, ten, or twenty per cent., when iron cannot be safe with less than seventy-five per cent.? It would appear impossible that the Secretary of the Treasury, entertaining the sentiments referred to in his report, can approve the bill now before the House.

The honorable chairman [Mr. VERPLANCK] tells us that "the bill before us is not a concession." It may, or may not, be so considered. But, sir, viewing it in all its bearings, if it is not a concession, it may be supposed to partake of something of a much more dangerous character. Mr. J. hoped the committee, for whom he felt great respect, would not look upon him as expressing the opinion, but it might appear to some to be the result of a combination to preserve particular interests, without regard to the sacrifice of others, or a political manœuvre to ensure the balance of power. Under all circumstances, is it expedient to pass the bill in its present form? Repeal the act of the last session; produce embarrassment and distress in some of the States, without satisfying the complaints of others, or, in any manner whatever, settling this exciting question of the tariff; pass the bill; let it become a law, and the question will still be unsettled. The members of the committee themselves cannot take this as a permanent financial system, which presents the anomaly of a high rate of duty upon the most important articles of agriculture, which is neither intended for protection, nor required for revenue. Will the members of the committee from Virginia, from Georgia, or from Tennessee, consent to a permanent duty of seventy-five per cent. upon iron? If so, then, indeed, have they abandoned the interests of the planters and the farmers for other considerations.

What, then, are the merits of the bill? It does not equalize the burdens; it does not fairly distribute the benefits. It is not intended to destroy the manufacturing interests; yet, with the exception of a few favored classes, it does it effectually. It is nominally to release several of the States from the burdens of which they complain; and it will afford just cause of complaint to about as many more. But the revenue must be reduced to 15,000,000 dollars, and the excitement in the country requires that something should be done to allay it. If reduction be, as it is in fact, the only principle in the bill, is there no equitable mode by which it can be made? And cannot the excitement be allayed, without transferring the discontent from one quarter of the Union to another? What will it avail the country to restore peace and quiet in the South, and raise up a similar dissatisfaction in the North? If you really desire an equal distribution of the rates of import, so modify your bill that none may have a right to complain, and do not force it through in its present exceptionable form. The estimates of the Committee of Ways and Means are far from being satisfactory; they are too loose and undefined. In estimating the amount of revenue that would accrue under the act of 1832, the Secretary of the Treasury, founded on the average importations of the last six years, produces a revenue of about 18,000,000 dollars—three millions more than are required for the expenditures of the Government. The committee make their calculation upon the probable average of the next six years, and make the act of 1832 produce a revenue, including the public lands, of not less than twenty millions and a half, and probably more than 24,000,000; exhibiting an excess of from 5 to 9,000,000 dollars over the just uses of the Government. Why the committee should have taken the next six years as the basis of calculation for the revenue that would accrue under the act of 1832, and have confined their estimates to the value of the imports of the year 1831, for that which would accrue under their bill, they do not state; but it is sufficiently apparent that the effect of this estimate upon the imports of the different years, is to swell the amount of revenue under the law of 1832, and lessen it under the committee's bill. Taking, then, the Secretary's estimate of 18,000,000 dollars, under the law of 1832, it requires only a reduction of 3,000,000 dollars, to bring the revenue down to the proper expenditures of the Government; and a gradual prospective reduction upon that amount would be far more fair and equitable than that proposed by the bill under consideration.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

But, sir, if the act of 1832 is so very exceptionable to our Southern friends, is there no other mode of reduction which would be acceptable? First, then, settle the principle upon which you intend to act. Let the country understand what is "the intention and policy of this Government in regard to their several interests." Is it intended that the system of protection shall be abandoned? If so, let it be distinctly understood, so that those interested may prepare for the result. Do you contemplate only incidental protection? Then adapt your rates of impost so that none may have a right to complain. Do you discard all other considerations, and look solely at the revenue? Then "make such a readjustment of the rates of impost as may distribute and equalize the burdens amongst all."

Mr. J. said that, if the honorable chairman would so modify his bill as to embrace the principles contained in his report, whatever might be the course of his [Mr. J.'s] friends, it should have his support. Whatever might be the views of other gentlemen, he was prepared to go far towards conciliation; but he could not consent, by voting for the bill in its present shape, to hold out illusions which were not intended to be realized. He could not consent to deceive his friends in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and elsewhere, who were concerned in the iron and coal interests, by inducing them to believe that their protection was to be upon a permanent basis, and that of others entirely destroyed. Are the manufacturing interests of this country, generally, entitled to no consideration?

Mr. J. said that, next to the war which had acquired for us so much glory and character, the country was indebted to the system of protection, and the consequent attendant of internal improvement, for that high state of prosperity which called forth the expressive language in the Executive message, that "our country presents, on every side, marks of prosperity and happiness, unequalled, perhaps, in any other portions of the world." Let us not, then, inconsiderately destroy this fair picture; but let us endeavor to reconcile conflicting opinions. Three modes occur, either of which would be more likely to accomplish this than that proposed by the committee—one of which has already been adverted to.

1st. An equal prospective reduction upon the act of last session, until the revenue is reduced to fifteen millions.

2d. The duties distributed over the protected articles within the amount of revenue required.

3d. An ad valorem duty upon all imported articles.

Either of these would establish a principle which "might last for many years."

To the first, Mr. J. said he should add nothing more.

By the second, the duties might be so arranged as to give an ample protection against foreign capital and competition, without exceeding the amount of revenue.

The third, he admitted he could not approve, unless a discrimination was made in favor of domestic production. But an equal ad valorem duty upon all imported articles he believed to be infinitely preferable to the present bill. It would have the merit, whatever injury it might work, of favoring no particular class, of creating no well founded jealousy. Mr. J. said he should detain the committee no longer, having already much exceeded the time he had intended to occupy when he rose. He concluded by saying that he should vote for the motion before the Chair for striking out the duties upon teas and coffee, which, should it prevail, he should follow up by a motion to lessen the duty upon iron, when he hoped the bill would be so modified as to "equalize" the duties upon other articles, so that it might be acceptable to the country. Then peace and harmony might be restored, and the basis of a permanent financial system established.

Mr. DENNY, of Pennsylvania, next rose. He said he had hoped that the action of Congress upon the important subject of the tariff, at the last session, would have sufficed, at least, for one year. It was after the most ample and pertinacious discussion, and the most mature and deliberate consideration, that the law of July, 1832, was enacted. And yet, said he, before that law has gone into operation; before we can have any certain knowledge of the effects which it would produce upon the revenue and business of the country, the subject is again disturbed, the country is again to be agitated, and the law is to be repealed before it shall begin to operate. We are, then, unwillingly on my part, urged into the consideration of this exciting subject, by the voice of the majority. To it I always submit; I shall not complain of it, nor use epithets which have more than once been applied to the majority in this House, but which I consider as now applicable only to the proceedings of a certain organized majority in a part of the country south of this capital.

It does seem to me, said Mr. D., that the Committee of Ways and Means have not bestowed that close, minute, and careful consideration upon the details of the bill before us, and its bearing upon the industry of the country, which the importance of the measure required. It seems to have been prepared hastily and incautiously, with a view merely to the reduction of revenue and reduction of duties, regarding as of little consequence, in comparison with these, the great interests to be affected.

Sir, I must speak freely on this subject; and I hope what I may say will not be attributed to any want of respect for the honorable gentlemen composing the Committee of Ways and Means, upon which is placed my worthy colleague, [Mr. GILMORE,] towards whom I have long entertained sentiments of esteem and friendship, and with whom I am associated on this floor in representing the same body of constituents.

The district which we represent has not, perhaps, its equal in the Union for the variety, extent, number, and value of its manufactures. By means of these, thousands of industrious laborers, farmers, and mechanics are sustaining themselves, rearing and educating their families. Believing, then, as I do, this bill to be fraught with destruction to the interests committed to us, and calculated to bring embarrassment and ruin upon them, and to consign to idleness and penury thousands in every part of the country, who are now earning a subsistence by their labor and industry, I cannot give to it my support; and the position in which I am placed by my respected colleague, [Mr. GILMORE,] who has advocated the bill, forbids me to be silent.

The magnitude, in a national point of view, of the interests which are now placed in jeopardy by this bill; the whole industry of the nation about to be injuriously affected; and the vital concern which my immediate constituents have in the question now submitted to us, demand from me a free, fearless, and unreserved expression of the opinions I entertain of this bill; of the course which the Committee of Ways and Means has pursued; and of their views, so far as the gentlemen have condescended to favor us with them.

The first thing which presents itself to my mind, as being unusual in relation to such a grave and important subject, is the precipitancy with which the committee seems to have acted. The more I examine the bill and the report of the committee, the more I am persuaded that some means, out of the usual course, operated to hasten the deliberations of the committee. Hence, sir, the ill-shapen offspring of their labors; it is without symmetry, and without that proper adjustment of parts which is the result of careful and laborious deliberation. I will not say that it has no prominent feature; it has at least one which diffuses an expression through the whole. It requires no learned phrenologist to perceive that the organ of destructiveness is predominant. The learned gentleman at the head of the committee has not imparted others, to soften the harshness of this engrossing organ, or to neutralize its influence on the character; it presents itself at every point of view; it is stamped on every lineament, and, turn it which way you will, you read destruction to the industry of the country. The practical operation of this bill upon the country cannot be defended; its provisions are destructive. The committee observe a strict silence upon the details of the bill. The gentleman from Georgia, to whom I often listen with pleasure, is now eloquently silent. He does not attempt to recommend this bitter cup to the mechanics and laborers of the country. And the worthy gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] is also silent. The torrent of his eloquence, which has often rushed into this hall, and either carried every thing with it, or dashed itself into spray, is hushed; frozen, like the mountain stream in mid-winter. There is discretion in their silence.

My colleague [Mr. GILMORE] has attempted, not so much a defence of this bill, as an apology for his course in relation to it. No attempt has yet been made to point out the beneficial operation of the provisions of this bill upon the industry of the country. The gentlemen are right in not attempting what, perhaps, in their own judgments, they cannot sustain or establish. It shall be my endeavor to divest this bill of its decorations, and expose it to the country in its true, odious colors. And, unless the charges which are made against this bill, of injustice, destruction, and embarrassment, shall be answered, the country will be authorized to take them as confessed, or our arguments as conclusive. What does the committee say in their report in defence of this bill? You may look, and you will look in vain, for a just exposition of its details. A minute detail the committee were either unable or unwilling to undertake to furnish to the House; and yet, sir, we must enter into this detail, and closely inspect the provisions of the bill, before we can judge of the propriety of passing it. It is only by examining the bearing of the particulars of the bill, that we can form a just opinion of the probable effects of the measure upon the industry and labor of the nation.

The committee has furnished us with some general views in relation to the finances of the country; the revenue; the public debt; the probable receipts and expenditures. I shall not detain you, sir, by entering upon an examination of these views, some of which, I think, are erroneous. The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. IVERSON,] who is a member of the committee, has satisfactorily exposed this part of the report, as well as the inaccuracy of the estimates stated in it.

The committee seems to be much afraid of a full treasury; in their opinion, it must be kept empty; and yet they say we are "a nation loving peace, yet prepared for war." An empty treasury is a novel kind of preparation for war; it may prove a preservative of peace, by keeping us too poor to go to war, even in defence of our liberties. What have we to dread from a full treasury? Are we to presume, with the committee, that it will lead or tempt to "expenditures of doubtful constitutional right?" This is a strange doctrine. Have we no confidence in the Government? Can we not trust in the integrity of this House, of the other branch of the Legislature, and of the Executive? Are we not all responsible to the people for our acts? Will they not apply a corrective, when we shall be found disbursing the money for unconstitutional purposes? But, from the fear of tempting to "expenditures of doubtful constitutional right," you will deny to your Government the means of expenditure for objects of undoubted constitutional right; for objects of great national utility; for education; the diffusion of knowledge; increasing the facilities of intercourse; multiplying and strengthening the bonds of our Union. If Congress cannot be trusted with means for promoting these great leading objects of national importance, then why not adopt the suggestions from the President, recommending a distribution among the States of any surplus revenue? Executive suggestions and recommendations are only partially received by the committee; they are readily and exultingly adopted, when they can be construed to give support to the destructive policy of the committee; but when these suggestions are of a different character, and do not coincide with, nor favor the scheme of the committee, they are rejected or disregarded.

From the suggestions made by the President, in relation to a disposition of the public lands, it is evident that he does not think they should any longer constitute a source whence to derive revenue for the support of the Government; and it is also well known, that, in the other branch of the Legislature, there is a measure under consideration, which, in all probability, will become a law, providing for a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, for a limited period, among the States; and I may say, sir, that public sentiment is decidedly in favor of this proposition. And yet, in the face of all this, the committee insist on considering the public lands as a permanent source of revenue from which to draw directly from the pockets of the people two and a half millions of dollars. And why? In order to relieve the customs. This is the reason; to reduce, to a still lower sum, the duties on foreign merchandise; and thus, to the same amount, encourage and stimulate foreign industry, and depress our own. Is this liberal? Is this just? The Committee of Ways and Means insist that the poorer class of citizens, who want to settle on your public lands, and improve the wilderness, must be taxed two and a half millions of dollars, in order that foreign manufacturers may be relieved, and the surplus productions of foreign laborers and mechanics, invited here to be thrown into our markets, sold at auction, and sacrificed; subjecting our own industrious citizens to embarrassments and ruin, by glutting our markets, and producing fluctuations and uncertainty. This is an odious feature in the bill, and particularly so, when coupled with the proposition to tax teas and coffee, necessities of life not produced in our country.

To reduce the revenue seems to have been the all-absorbing subject with the committee; and so intent were they on this, that they lost sight of, or do not seem to understand, the practical operation of their bill upon the country. They profess to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government. How? By first limiting the Government in its wants; prescribing what, in their opinion, shall form the exclusive objects of expenditure, and then limiting the revenue to these expenditures; omitting provision for objects of great national utility. The intention of the committee being to reduce the revenue, they strangely attempt to accomplish their purpose, by means calculated to increase the revenue. First, by laying and increasing duties on tea and coffee, necessities of life, which enter into the consumption of the whole country, and which are not produced here. And, again, by reducing the duties on foreign distilled spirits; thus encouraging an increase of importation, and, consequently, an increase of revenue. I need not detain you by going into an examination of this branch of the subject; it has been sufficiently illustrated by gentlemen who preceded me.

The committee, after speaking of this being "a fit season for permanent fiscal regulations," say, "it is vitally important, too, to all engaged in any of those numerous commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural enterprises, which are affected by changes in the rates of impost, and are more exposed to suffer from uncertainty than even error in legislation, now to know the intention and policy of this Government in regard to their several interests." Here we have a concession of the vital importance of this subject to the whole interests of the country, and are to understand that the propositions of the committee are recommended as worthy of being adopted as permanent fiscal regulations. Is it not then reasonable to demand from the committee, and is it not their duty to furnish to the House, information more in detail as to the probable effects of their bill upon "the numerous commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural interests which are to be affected by it," before we shall adopt it? This has not been done. The committee has not pointed out the effects to be produced upon those great national interests by the proposed measure. What have they done? By applying their own principles to the bill and its provisions, we will find that they have sent to us a bill reducing duties, but not reducing revenue; a bill so injudiciously and inconsiderately, not to say intentionally, framed as to cause the reductions to fall on those articles supplied to us by several branches of industry, which the Government, from the earliest period to the present moment, has deemed entitled to be encouraged, fostered, and protected; articles which, in consequence of this protection, are now to be obtained in abundance, of superior quality to the foreign articles, and upon as good, if not better terms, under a fair competition. For these articles, nothing more is now required but a just and adequate protection against foreign legislation and foreign pauper labor. Destroy not these branches of industry which now amply reward the Government for its care; which are now successfully pursued, and have reached a high degree of improvement, owing to the superior skill, enterprise, and ingenuity of our citizens; which have enriched the nation by multiplying its resources, while, at the same time, they have excited the envy and hostile feeling of foreign manufacturers and foreign Governments. The bill on our tables seems to me to have been prepared without forecast, and very little knowledge of the great interests which it is to affect. Ignorance and fear may prostrate in a moment what patriotism and talents, with much time and energy, and skill, and care, and laborious attention, established. Sir, what is this bill? It is called a "bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports." Let us examine it closely, and I think we shall find reasons for changing its title to one more appropriate; such as, a bill of destruction, or to abolish protection; to impoverish the American mechanic and laborer, and humanely encourage the labor of British paupers; to destroy industry, paralyze enterprise; to encourage opposition to the laws, a title which the bill may deserve from the cause of its introduction at this time; or, as reduction is its ostensible object, to reduce our confidence in our Government; or to reduce the once rebellious colonies to a dependence upon the mother country.

Protection is withdrawn by this bill. Cotton and woollen manufactories, now giving employment to millions of capital and thousands of our citizens, are consigned to destruction. Wool and woollens, in which our farmers are particularly interested, seem to be selected as the victims to be offered as a sacrifice to appease the discontents of the South. The workmen are to be consigned to idleness and penury, and the sheep of the farmers and wool-growers to the slaughter-house. This blow at the manufacturers will wound deeply the farmers and wool-growers of the Northern, Middle, and Western States. Give to wool and woollens protection for the same period of time which has been extended to Virginia tobacco, and, sir, at the expiration of that time there will be the same reason for considering the duty as nominal that the chairman now has for thinking the duty on tobacco to be nominal. This now called nominal duty was first laid to protect the Virginia planters; they did not complain, nor did other States. And now the tobacco planters of Virginia, with a prohibitory duty in their favor, which has been continued for many years, generally strike off all protection which has been but for a short time afforded to the interests of the farmers and wool-growers of the Northern, Middle, and Western States. Why, sir, there is more capital invested in the wool and woollen business than would be sufficient to purchase the whole of the miserable tobacco region of Virginia, with its slaves and race-horses, twice told. Sir, the woollen manufacture is to the country one of the most important, from the variety of interests which it embraces. The farmers have a more direct and extensive interest in the woollen manufacture than in any other: it is a twofold interest. They raise the sheep, they furnish the wool, the raw material, and provide subsistence. It is in this way that the farmers are benefited by the extension and success of manufactories, in furnishing raw material for some, and subsistence for all; in truth, they are the basis upon which the whole rest. And when the manufactories are destroyed, and the mechanics impoverished, the farmers become involved in the same distress, and suffer with the others. In the interior of the country, the towns, which are the work as well as the abode of mechanics, and the manufacturing establishments, afford markets for the productions of the farmers, for their beef, pork, sheep, wool, grain, breadstuffs, and a variety of raw materials. If these markets be destroyed, all, or the greater portion of this produce, must be sent by rivers, canals, turnpikes, and railroads, to a more distant market on the seaboard, and then to be sold perhaps for the mere cost of transportation.

The importance of the cotton and woollen manufactures to the country is sufficiently obvious; and my colleagues [Messrs. CHAWFORD and McKENNA] have ably commented upon the injurious effects which this bill will produce upon those interests and all connected with them. More might be said upon this part of the bill, but, sir, I will not detain you by any remarks of mine, as some gentlemen much more competent will follow me, who, from their talents, thorough knowledge of the subject, and intimate acquaintance with the establishment, progress, and present condition of these branches of industry, are able to present to the House, in the clearest and most satisfactory manner, the prostration and embarrassment which will inevitably ensue from the adoption of the proposed measure. Allow me, however, to call your attention, for a short time, to the provisions of this bill in relation to iron. Iron has been called, by some gentlemen, a favorite with the committee. The committee seem to profess a partiality towards iron, it is true; but this partiality is better calculated to ruin the favorite, than conduce to its permanent benefit.

Iron is an article of the first necessity; it is indispensable; it is the foundation upon which we depend for many of the comforts of life, and it is essentially requisite for the national defence; therefore it is all-important that our country should be independent of foreigners for the supply of an article necessary to our existence and defence as a free and enlightened nation. Our country abounds with this material, and with the conveniences necessary to manufacture it into all the variety of articles which society demands. And since you have extended to the manufactures of iron an adequate protection, they have rapidly increased in extent, and multiplied in numbers. Furnaces, forges, rolling mills, and other establishments connected with these, have started into existence in every part of the country. Gentlemen mistake if they suppose that Pennsylvania is the only State interested in this article. Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee are now largely engaged in the business, and maintain an active competition with the Pennsylvanians in the markets of their own State. What has been the effect, then, of your protection? You have excited competition; you have called forth new enterprise; men of moderate capital, and possessing skill and practical knowledge, have been suitably encouraged to engage in these new undertakings, and the effects have been highly beneficial to the whole community. Prices have been greatly reduced to the consumers in our country, and foreigners and foreign ironmasters have been compelled to reduce their prices and diminish their profits. It is well known that the proprietors of iron works in Sweden, by an agreement and mutual understanding, lowered the price of iron, in order to counteract the protection and encouragement held out to our citizens by the tariff of 1828.

Look, sir, for a moment, at the effect produced by your protection laws upon prices. In 1818, at Pittsburg, bar iron sold at from one hundred and ninety to two hundred dollars per ton; now the price is about one hundred dollars. In 1818, 1819, and 1820, boiler iron was three hundred and fifty dollars per ton; now the price is about one hundred and forty dollars per ton. Sheet iron sold for eighteen dollars per hundred weight; the price is now from eight and a half to nine dollars. Hoop iron, from two hundred and fifty, is now at one hundred and twenty dollars per ton. Axes, from twenty-four dollars per dozen, have fallen to twelve dollars per dozen. Scythes, spades, and shovels have been reduced in price about fifty per cent. English vices were sold about the same time at from twenty to twenty-two and a half cents per pound; the American article, superior in quality, is sold at from nine and a half to twelve and a half cents per pound. Braziers' rods, in 1824, were imported, and cost three hundred and thirteen dollars and sixty cents per ton; now, by the American manufacturer, the price has been reduced to one hundred and thirty dollars per ton. Thus, sir, although the duties were increased, the prices were reduced, and the American consumer participated in the benefits derived under the protecting policy. This will always be the case. Similar results have taken place in all other cases where adequate protection to American industry has been afforded. In the primary manufacture of iron, considerable capital is required, more than in general can be commanded by one individual, and more than what one would be disposed to risk. But, by the protection under your laws, men of small capital are encouraged to unite with the practical mechanic, whose capital consists chiefly in his skill, economy, and industry; content with small profits, they are enabled to carry on business advantageously to themselves and to the community, by preserving a fair competition, and keeping down monopoly. Reduce the duties as proposed by this bill, withdraw adequate protection, expose these industrious and useful citizens to a severe competition with the foreign manufacturers, who may be enabled, by a removal of duties, to pour suddenly into our market the surplus from the workshops of Europe; and these men of but small capital, who are numerous, will be overwhelmed: only those establishments sustained by the largest capital could withstand the shock, and, if disturbed, might eventually recover. The final result, however, will be the destruction of competition in many parts of the country, and the establishment of monopoly. Continue to iron, and all its branches, adequate protection, as has been given to Virginia tobacco and Virginia coal, and it will soon become an important item among our domestic exports. The process of manufacturing iron with coke is about to be undertaken in Pennsylvania, under favorable circumstances. Several attempts have been heretofore made, none of which succeeded, and were attended with heavy losses to those who made the experiments. But, sir, perseverance, with the proper skill and management, must succeed; there is no reason why, with similar materials, this should not be the case here as well as in England. Then we will be furnished with a description of iron of inferior quality to the charcoal iron, but which will answer for a great many purposes, and at as cheap a rate as the English iron. This establishment is, however, yet in its infancy; and, instead of affording an argument, as my colleague [Mr. GILMORE] seemed to think it did, in favor of withholding or reducing protection, it is precisely in that situation presenting the strongest claims for protection. My colleague seems to be dissatisfied with the discrimination between hammered and rolled iron; a discrimination made originally with the express object of favoring the iron of Pennsylvania, and one or two other States. He thinks it unjust; and, to convince this committee, has read, not his own arguments, but the arguments of the British minister. Mr. Canning was advocating the cause of the British ironmasters: we are contending for our own manufacturers. In England, bar iron is made universally by rolling, and is greatly inferior to the hammered bar iron of Pennsylvania. That the British would complain of a measure intended for our benefit, is not to be wondered at; but it is a matter of some surprise that my colleague should introduce the arguments of Mr. Canning to prove the injustice of this measure, and this, too, after the British Government had subsequently abandoned the ground altogether.

It is said by some that iron and coal are protected, and that this should satisfy Pennsylvania: there is a fallacy here, which will appear in the progress of this discussion. Suppose, however, for the sake of the argument, that iron is protected; are there no other branches of industry important to Pennsylvania, and other States, which are not protected by this bill? The cotton, woollen, paper, and glass manufactures, not to name any more, are as valuable to Pennsylvania as her iron. Will it satisfy the farmers and wool-growers, and the thousands of other citizens of Pennsylvania, feeling a great interest in woollen, cotton, paper, glass, lead, and many branches of the iron business, to be told, when suffering under the embarrassments which this bill will bring upon them, you ought not to complain; the manufacturers of bar iron and nails in Pennsylvania are protected, as is also Pennsylvania coal? My colleague complains of the discrimination between rolled and hammered iron, and yet advocates a bill with discriminations of an odious character, because made between our own manufacturers. It professes to extend to one interest protection, while it consigns to destruction other branches of industry and interests equally meritorious and entitled to favor. Is this justice or equality? Sir, sir, I consider the protection which is proposed to iron in this bill to be all a delusion. Iron never was in more danger than it is under this bill, independently of the ruinous reductions directly proposed on several important manufactures of iron. Do we not all know, does any Pennsylvanian require to be told, that the whole protective policy must be sustained as a system, or it will perish? Its motto is, "United we stand, divided we fall." It cannot be otherwise. No reasonable man can, for a moment, suppose that iron would continue to receive protection from a Government which had broken down all the other important manufactories of the country. These being destroyed, the enemies of protective policy will be enabled to bring an increased force to operate against iron. We are all sensible of this. And Pennsylvania beholds in the ruin of the cotton, woollen, and other manufactures in which she and other States have a deep interest, the fate which awaits her iron and coal under the proposed bill. An accumulated opposition would bear down, irresistibly, upon all her great interests, and they would sink in the general ruin. What, then, will become of her bright prospects? They will all vanish. Her splendid and extensive improvements will be rendered unproductive, if not comparatively useless. The internal commerce and home trade, for which they were chiefly designed, will dwindle into insignificance under an abandonment of the protective system; and her canals, her numerous railroads, and turnpike roads, whilst they, deserted and in ruins, remain a monument to her noble public spirit and vigorous enterprise, will be a lasting reproach upon the Government in which she confided, but which denied protection to the great national interests. Coal might be saved. The "Old Dominion," for whose special benefit protection was originally extended to coal and tobacco, will stretch forth her mighty arm to save our coal: for it I have no fears. The patriotic sons of Virginia will defend the coal proprietors and miners of Pennsylvania, so long as their own coal shall not be exhausted; and, if we raised tobacco, they would generously protect that also. Sir, I repeat it, and it is well understood in Pennsylvania, the whole system must be sustained together, or it will inevitably perish.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

To be the better able to judge of the favor which it is alleged is shown to Pennsylvania in the bill before us, and of the amount of real protection afforded to iron, let me ask the attention of the committee to a few of the details on that subject. And here I must take the liberty to remark, that this part of the bill exhibits such strong Sarchett features as to impress upon my mind the belief that the Committee of Ways and Means, if they did not take counsel of their fears, as was intimated by my colleague, [Mr. McKIMMAN,] consulted a more artful enemy to American industry and manufactures, viz. that loving and faithful British subject, Mr. Sarchett, who very kindly visits Washington when the tariff is under discussion, to instruct the American Congress how best to protect American industry, and frame an American tariff. What interviews, if any, this individual has had with the Treasury Department and members of the committee in relation to this matter, is best known to the gentlemen themselves, and they can inform this House.

Before entering upon the brief examination which I propose to make, I will observe, sir, that the committee has furnished us with a tabular statement explanatory of the provisions of this bill: it purports to be a "statement of duties that will accrue under the bill presented to the House of Representatives by the Committee of Ways and Means;" and yet such are the discrepancies between this tabular statement and the provisions of the bill itself, in relation to some items, that it ought not to be relied on, and confirms me in the opinion that the bill was prepared without due care. And this statement is calculated to mislead us in some particulars. Take, for instance, nails and spikes. By the tabular statement, the lowest duty on nails is said to be sixty-two per cent, on spikes seventy-two per cent. ad valorem; the duty being calculated on the value of the imports of the year 1831. By adverting to the bill, to ascertain the rate of duty to be charged upon nails and spikes, we do not find that these articles are enumerated; and, in order to fix the duty, we are referred, under the thirty-seventh paragraph of the first section of the bill, to "the lowest rate of duty which would have been payable on the same under the acts of 1816 or 1832." By the act of 1832, the duty on nails is five cents per pound; on spikes four cents per pound, equal to seventy-eight and ninety-six per cent. ad valorem. By the act of 1816, the duty on nails is three cents, and on spikes two cents per pound; and yet the committee, in their tabular statement, has put down the duties at four cents and three cents. If, however, we are to be governed by the bill, and not the statement, we must assess the duties as under the act of 1816; and, instead of an ad valorem duty on nails of sixty-two per cent., it will amount only to about forty-six per cent., and on spikes about forty-seven or forty-eight per cent., instead of seventy-two per cent. In these instances, the statement misleads us in forming an estimate of the protection given by the committee to nails and spikes. I do not know that these circumstances are of any consequence, except to show how inaccurate the committee has been. Nails sell for little more than the duty, and some qualities rather below the present duty; the duty forms no part, therefore, of the price—a result produced by our machinery, under a protecting tariff. Other instances of difference might be given. To do justice to the committee, I will take their own construction of the provisions of their bill, and its operation as detailed in the tabular statement.

The duty on hammered iron, in bars or bolts, is reduced from thirty-three to twenty-eight per cent. This description of iron is sent from Russia and Sweden; but on the British, that is, the rolled iron, the duty is reduced from ninety-five to seventy-six per cent. The reduction on the Russian and Swedish iron, in the opinion of some gentlemen, will not injure materially the iron establishments in our country. The effect of the reduction on the inferior British iron will be to encourage the British manufacturers to send their rolled iron in greater quantities to this country, to the injury of our own rolling mills and forges. And when we view this in connexion with the great reductions proposed upon the manufactures of iron which now give employment to our rolling and slitting mills, the effect will be found to be exceedingly injurious, if not totally ruinous. A comparatively high duty is retained on the rolled iron, when many articles, in the manufacture of which our iron is used, are to be imported at duties greatly reduced; consequently, the effect will be to impair the market for the sale of our iron. Of what avail will be the duty on bar iron, if the manufactures, for which iron as a raw material is wanted, are to be sent into our market from the workshops of England at very low duties; thus depriving our blacksmiths and mechanics of employment, and destroying, in a great degree, the demand for the iron of our own country? The duty on bar iron is, therefore, a mere delusion.

The duty on iron, in cables and chains, or parts thereof, is to be reduced from fifty-nine to twenty per cent. ad valorem; on drawing-knives, axes, hatchets, woodscrews, shovels, spades, hoes, and other manufactures of iron, from thirty to twenty per cent.; on braziers' rods, from one hundred and seventeen to twenty per cent.; on nails and spike rods, from one hundred and seventeen to twenty per cent.; on nail plates, from three cents per pound to twenty per cent.; on slit, rolled, or hammered, for band-iron, casement rods, &c. from ninety-six to twenty per cent.

H. of R.]

The Tariff Bill.

I will not affirm, should this bill go into operation, that the duties or rates of duty will actually be as is stated by the committee in the table accompanying their report. By the act of 1816, iron in rods (and this may include nail rods, spike rods, and braziers' rods) was subject to a duty of two dollars and fifty cents per cwt. The committee, in all probability, made their calculation upon the supposition that iron in rods was to be considered as embraced in the class of non-enumerated manufactures of iron; not adverting to the fact that iron in rods is specified in the act of 1816, and subject to a specific duty of two dollars and fifty cents per cwt.

With a view still further to show the mischief which this bill will produce, let us for a moment examine the provision in relation to flint glass. This is one of the most important and interesting manufactures in the United States. I think the first extensive manufactory of this kind was established at Pittsburgh, the place of my nativity, which I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor. In 1812, there were, perhaps, two furnaces in operation at that place; there are now five. Other establishments, equally, and some much more extensive, have started into existence, in various parts of our country, under the protection derived from your laws. Great improvements have been made in the manufacture. The skill and ingenuity of our workmen now furnish the country with articles equal, if not superior in quality to any imported, and at prices greatly reduced, not exceeding those at which English flint glass can be fairly imported. Thousands of our citizens are now deriving a subsistence from this manufacture; it employs some thousands of tons of shipping, and consumes a variety of raw materials, some of which cannot be applied to any other useful purpose, and is trampled under our feet; millions of pounds of lead, of pot and pearl ashes, are required, besides several hundred thousand bushels of coal. I have no estimate with me of the whole amount of capital invested in this business, but its value to the nation may be learned from the statement before me, by which it appears that the total amount of flint glass now made in the United States is about one million three hundred thousand dollars per annum.

This, then, is briefly the state of the flint glass manufacture, as it now exists, having grown up under our protective policy. Let us now see what amount of protection is to be afforded under this bill.

Our existing tariff imposes on flint glass, uncut, a compound duty of two cents per pound, and twenty per cent. ad valorem, equal to an ad valorem duty of thirty-five per cent. on the imports of 1831. What will be the protection under the bill? It discards the specific duty of two cents per pound, and retains only the twenty per cent. ad valorem on plain glass, and reduces to the same low point the duty on cut glass, which is considered an article of luxury, and is now subject to a compound duty of three cents per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem, equivalent to an ad valorem duty of only thirty-seven per cent. on the imports of 1831.

But, sir, this is not all. In this, as in all other branches of industry, our greatest competitors are the British, who are encouraged to ship to this country their surplus and refuse stock, in order to obtain the drawback allowed on its exportation. And, if I am not mistaken, this drawback allowed to the British manufacturer exceeds the excise duty twelve shillings and six pence per cwt., which is a clear bounty to the manufacturer of about two and a half cents per pound. In general, the amount of duty paid, compared with the value or quantity of the articles fairly and honestly imported, will exhibit, in some degree, the quantum of protection. But, in the case of flint glass, in order to ascertain the true amount of real protection, we must deduct the excess of drawback over excise, or this bounty, paid to the British manufacturer on the weight of glass exported, from the aggregate duty paid on importation to this country.

In 1831, there were imported 749,485 pounds of glass, uncut. Upon the exportation of this quantity, the British manufacturer would receive, at two and a half cents per pound, $18,737 over and above the excise duty paid by him. This quantity of glass was valued, at the place of exportation, at $102,075; on this valuation our duty was calculated, and amounted to $35,405; from which deduct $18,737, and the amount paid to the British manufacturer will leave $16,668 on $102,075, equal to about sixteen per cent., the protection afforded under our existing tariff to the American manufacturer. The bill now under consideration proposes to reduce this by throwing away the specific duty of two cents per pound. In 1831, the whole amount of duty received on 749,485 pounds of glass, uncut, was $35,405; deduct from this the amount produced by the specific duty of two cents per pound, viz. $14,989, the remainder, $20,416, is the amount of duty which would be chargeable under the bill now before us, being at the rate of twenty per cent. ad valorem. Deduct from this amount the sum paid to the British manufacturer, believed to be about two and a half cents per pound, amounting to $18,737, the balance, viz. $1,679, is the amount of real protection, considerably below two per cent., which the Committee of Ways and Means are willing to allow to the American manufacturers against the surplus and refuse stock, drawbacks, fraudulent invoices, and valuations of their British rivals. Twenty per cent. ad valorem will not be adequate protection, because it will be counteracted by the foreign valuation, if by no other foreign regulation.

These details are tedious, but are necessary to a thorough understanding of the destructive operation of this bill. I shall not, however, detain you by going into a further examination of them. Nor is it my intention to inquire whether this bill will reduce the revenue or not; it is sufficient ground for me to withhold from it my approbation, to find that its practical operation on the country will be ruinous to its industry, and prejudicial to our best interests.

The Committee of Ways and Means admit that the changes proposed in the bill may be injurious; and say, "It is vitally important to the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests, to know what is to be the permanent policy." How are these injurious consequences to be guarded against? What alleviation is provided by the bill? It is said the reductions are to be gradual upon some articles; the lowest reduction is not to take effect until the 2d day of March, 1835. How, and to whom will this afford relief? It may to the manufacturers and employers, by giving them time to sell off their stock, and work up materials on hand. Will they replenish? No. They will diminish their business; curtail expenditures; manufacture less; reduce the wages of workmen; discharge many from employment; and finally dismiss the whole number, and close the factories and workshops. Such is the remedy for the evils which the bill will produce. Upon whom will these evils press most severely? Not, sir, upon the employers and large capitalists; but they will fall with accumulated weight—upon whom? Upon the poorer workmen, the mechanics, and the laborers; the very class of individuals of all others who ought to be protected; they compose an industrious and very numerous class in our community, and contribute essentially to the prosperity of the country. Deprived of employment, they are deprived of subsistence, of the means for the support and education of their families. This is not all; these individuals are yet more severely dealt with in this bill; while it deprives them of employment, by encouraging foreign labor, it taxes the necessities of life more heavily. Tea and coffee enter into the consumption of every family in the country; and while their means to obtain them are diminished, they find them taxed the higher under this bill. Look at the injustice and inequality of this bill. Negro clothing and negro blankets, articles which can be made abundantly in our country, to gratify the Southern planter, are allowed to be imported at the low duty of five per cent. Yet, sir, the free laborers of the Northern, Middle, and Western States, with whom tea and coffee are necessities of life, and which cannot be produced in our country, and which were made free of duty by the law of 1832, are now to be taxed twenty per cent. as was first proposed in the bill, but which the chairman of the committee now proposes to reduce about one-half on teas. Why this partiality toward the slave laborer? and why this apparent disposition to depress the free laborer? Where is the justice or equality by which the committee professed to be actuated?

Before we shall adopt the system now proposed, which is so destructive to American industry, and favorable to British manufacturers and pauper labor, and which the committee recommend as a permanent policy, let us for a moment inquire into the trade between this country and England, and see what amount she takes of the productions of our farmers. Sir, we know that our breadstuffs are often excluded, in consequence of the high duties; these are fluctuating, ascending or descending, according to the average price of grain for certain periods of time in the English market. I find, from the table of exports for 1831, that there were shipped for England twenty-six barrels of beef, one hundred and thirty barrels of pork, 2,865 pounds of hams and bacon; of flour, there was a much larger quantity, 865,744 barrels. It is well known, however, that much of our flour which is shipped for England never enters the English market. The duties on all the agricultural productions of the Northern, Middle, and Western States are enormous and prohibitory. The whole British tariff is a protecting one; and whether the rates of duty are high, moderate, or low, comparatively, they are designed to afford adequate protection; and the better to effect this object, the duties are generally specific, and not ad valorem. The ad valorem rates are also so arranged, that protection is secured where it is necessary upon those articles the importation of which might interfere with the industry of the country; duties are imposed of twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, and as high as seventy-five per cent.; these duties are calculated upon the value of the articles at the place of importation. By our system, the protection given incidentally, or otherwise, under ad valorem rates of duty, is, in many instances, less than what the duties would seem to afford, because they are estimated on the value of the articles at the place of exportation; thus putting it in the power of the foreign manufacturers and exporters to commit frauds, undervalue their goods, and impose on the appraisers in this country.

It is admitted that, under this bill, importations of foreign goods will be greatly increased for a few years at least. The effect upon England will be, to stimulate her industry, enrich her manufacturers and merchants, while it impoverishes us, and depresses our labor. The increased employment given to her laborers and paupers will relieve her parishes; and, with the increased consumption of iron and iron manufactures, of wool and woollens, will give an additional value to her landed interest, and thus enrich the more her aristocracy.

Besides being of immense and paramount importance to the nation, the protective policy is one of deep and vital concern to my immediate constituents, and to the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. Among my constituents there are no incorporated manufacturing companies which have excited so much clamor; there are no monopolists. Business is conducted by industrious, skillful, enterprising mechanics, practical men, who, in the numerous and various branches of industry they pursue, rely on their own labor, attention, and credit, and, in most cases, depend on their own capital. These are not the only persons concerned; the laboring, the agricultural, and every class in the community, are alike interested in the protective principle. And, while I am sustaining what appears to be the interests more immediately of the manufacturers and mechanics, I am, at the same time, sustaining the interests of the husbandmen, the farmers, and wool growers. The thousands of mechanics and laborers engaged at the factories, the mills, and the workshops, at the loom, the anvil, and the bench, must, themselves, and their families, be clothed and furnished with subsistence. Are not all dependent on the farmers and wool growers for food and comfortable clothing? Close the workshops, discharge the workmen, deprive them of employment, and, from being consumers of breadstuffs, and other agricultural productions, and furnishing a market to the farmer, they, to sustain life, must become rival producers, and glut the market with a surplus. Our farmers understand this operation.

In some respects, I view the contest between the British landholders and cultivators and the American farmers, between the British manufacturers and the American manufacturers and mechanics, for the American market. Shall we then adopt any measure calculated to favor our opponents in this controversy, and embarrass our own citizens? I, for one, am not so disposed. The farmers and mechanics of Pennsylvania, and especially those to whose partiality I am indebted for the honor of a seat here, shall never find in me one shrinking from the support of their interests, which are identified with the prosperity and independence of the nation. The repeated testimony of their confidence demands from me every exertion of my humble powers to defend them from hostile efforts of foreign rivals or domestic foes. I cannot desert them under any circumstances, nor make the important interests confided to my care the subjects of mere experiment in legislation, by pursuing a doubtful policy, and perhaps consign thousands of meritorious citizens to idleness and penury. Sir, I shall continue to advocate protection, decided, unequivocal protection, and shall resist all measures impairing it, or of a doubtful character.

I regret that my worthy and esteemed colleague [Mr. GILMORE] and myself cannot go together upon this bill; it may be my misfortune. He thinks his course correct. I have nothing to fear. I am confident of being sustained by our constituents at home, and by public sentiment throughout the State. And I do most sincerely hope that my colleague, when in retirement, may have no self-reproach for having, perhaps by the last act of his political life, unintentionally inflicted an irreparable injury upon our constituents, and given a vital stab to the best interests and prospects of our own State, and of the nation. My esteem, respect, and, he will permit me to say, friendship for my colleague, will not allow me for a moment to doubt the honesty and purity of his motives, and the patriotism which actuates him; and I shall always cherish towards him these same sentiments, which, for years, I have entertained, whether we shall be associated in the public councils of the nation, or meet in the social intercourse of private life. I cannot, however, but lament, on the present occasion, what I believe to be mistaken and erroneous views on his part.

I have already noticed a portion of the argument of my colleague; I would here briefly advert to one or two more points. To justify the reductions of the duties on edge tools, he has read to us a letter from Mr. Dunlap, giving some account of the manufactory of edge tools at Chambersburg. The success which has attended this manufacture is owing to the protection under the tariff of 1828, which subjected articles of this description to duties from thirty-five to forty per cent. The letter furnishes no reason for withdrawing the protection, and reducing the duties on edge tools, spades, shovels, and other manufactures of iron, from thirty-five and forty per cent., under the act of 1828, and thirty per cent., under the act of 1832, to the low rate of twenty per cent. ad valorem. The benefits of protecting duties are clearly shown in this letter, which proves that, under these duties, our manufacturers can supply the country with better and cheaper articles than some of the English manufacturers can do, in a fair competition.

My colleague admits that considerable embarrassment will be produced by this bill, and frankly says it is unavoidable; and this is to quiet the murmurs and discontents which exist in the South. The committee also alluded to those discontents. How are they to be healed? By acquiescing in the demands of the discontented, when you acknowledge that certain distress will be the consequence to other parts of the country. But we are told that the Union is to be preserved by this measure. Sir, you weaken the Union by destroying the domestic industry of the country, from which springs that extensive and diversified home trade, which, while it promotes a mutual dependence, unites us the more closely. This is the great cement of our Union: destroy or impair it, and the parts composing this Union may continue to occupy the same relative position for a time; but, resting loosely on each other, they will be the more easily disturbed, and finally overthrown, by some rude hand. We are called on by some gentlemen to abandon the protective policy, because of the attitude which South Carolina has assumed. We are told that it is a crisis. It is a crisis with South Carolina. She stands on the verge of a precipice! Who has brought her to this precipice? Not this House; not this Government; her own infatuated politicians have led her on, and now tell us that, unless we retrace our steps—repeal the deliberate enactments of this Government—she will step over this precipice; she will plunge into the dark abyss of disunion, there to writhe and wrangle under the miseries in which her own folly will involve her. Are we to yield to her unreasonable demands, because she has resolved to resist the laws of the Union? Shall we, from the fear of this resistance, submit to her dictation? This is the very ground upon which her leaders hope to succeed. One of them, a Colonel Preston, in a speech at a public meeting, said, "The protective system reels under our blows. Last summer, the fear of that resistance which we had announced, drove them into a reduction." Such is their language. Last summer we were driven into a reduction, and now we are to be driven into an abandonment of the protective system, from the fear of resistance! I cannot agree to succumb, in legislation, to menace or force. Are we to legislate with a lash over our backs? Would gentlemen (and I put the question to them) be willing to revoke the laws of this Union, if there were an armed force even at the doors of this hall making the demand? I think not, unless they were willing to surrender the liberties of the country. A Pennsylvania Assembly once said to a Deputy Governor, "Those who would give up essential liberty to purchase a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety." As a Pennsylvanian, I appreciate the sentiment: as a lover of my country, I shall adhere to protection, which is connected with essential liberty. Sir, some gentlemen are content to raise the standard of Union with protection down. I shall run up the Union flag, with protection up, to the very top of the mainmast of our ship of State, and there I would nail it fast, where it should remain until shot away by some foreign enemy, or cut down by the ruthless hand of a mutineer on board. Protection is necessary to life, liberty, independence, and the perpetuity of the Union. Sir, I will not yield to any gentleman in attachment to our beloved Union. I will cherish it as fervently. Were it otherwise with me, I would be a traitor to the patriotic principles of the fathers of our revolution. I should prove a traitor to the principles, ever dear to me, of one whose blood flows in the veins of the humble individual addressing you, who participated in that glorious struggle; ay, sir, who perilled his life on the very soil of South Carolina, to win for her and her sons that liberty, protection, and independence, which she now would deny to us, under our happy Union. It is the Union which will elevate us to the pinnacle of power and prosperity as a people, and attract to this nation the attention and admiration of the civilized world.

SALT DUTY.

Mr. HOWARD, of Maryland, presented a memorial from certain inhabitants of Baltimore, on the subject of the rock salt manufactured in the State of Maine, and observed that he intended, at the earliest possible moment, to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole, now engaged in the discussion of the tariff, to the subject of this memorial. He thought it proper to state its contents. If the allegations in it were true, and he had not the slightest doubt of their truth, the result of our legislation on the subject of salt was most extraordinary. It benefited the British shipping, and the manufactory of fossil salt in Maine, whilst it deeply injured American shipping, was ruining the American manufacturer, and giving the consumer a bad article. British ships, said Mr. H., are obliged to come to Nova Scotia for timber, and rather than come empty, they bring fossil salt at a very low freight, which pays a low duty, and is taking exclusive possession of the market. The following calculation he believed to be correct, as the information respecting Liverpool was derived from a commercial house there of unexceptionable standing:

Rock salt can be delivered on board at Liverpool, at from 6s. 9d. to 7s. 6d. per ton,	s. d.
which includes the river freight, say	7 6
The best kind costs an additional sum of	2 0
Freight in British ships from 6s. to 10s.	10 0
	19 6
Cost of raw material at the manufactory in Maine	7 cents.
Duty on ditto	1
Allow for loss in manufacturing	2
Cost on manufacturing	5
	15 cents.
Add for contingencies and profits	10
	25
Cost of Liverpool common salt by actual importation, including first cost, freight, and other expenses	25 cents.
Duty	10

Thus it would seem that for 25 cents the article, such as it is, can be sold in our markets. But Mr. H. said he never heard of any sales at this price; on the contrary, by coming within a few cents of the market price of other salt, the consumer was not repaid in cheapness for the injury sustained by other classes of society. The raw material was in a foreign country, and of course the supply would be precarious in time of war; and yet the manufactory was encouraged by our legislation at the expense of American shipping, to the destruction, also, of that class of American manufacturers who use the raw material found in our country. A parallel to this provident legislation was difficult to be found. The memorialists prayed that the duty on foreign salt might be diminished, or that the duty on fossil salt might be increased, either of which steps would restore to American shipping the equality with British which the present legislation has taken away. He moved a reference of the memorial to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it should be printed.

Mr. JARVIS said that, when the proper time arrived, he should be prepared to meet the question; but at present it seemed to him a proposition on the part of a few shipowners, to enable themselves to fleece the people of the country.

Mr. HOWARD said that he would make but a single remark in reply. When the time arrived for discussion, he should be able to prove, from papers in his possession, and from the speech delivered upon this floor by the gentleman from Maine last summer, that the clear profits of this manufactory of fossil salt could not have been less than a hundred thousand dollars last year. These were the persons who were fleecing, without compunction, the whole people of the United States, under the protection of a monopoly which he would do his best to break up. As this was not the time to discuss the subject at large, he renewed the motion to refer and print; which motion prevailed.

The House having again gone into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL,

Mr. WHITE, of Louisiana, rose, and said, if it is in order for me to address the Chair, I hope it is in possibility for the Chair to hear me. Aware of mine own infirmity, I may need its admonition if I should happen to deviate from rule or propriety.

I have no expectation, said he, of being able to make any very new or important discoveries in that grand mysterious region called by us the tariff. Too many travelers have explored it before me. They have described it too minutely, and too graphically, for me to think of following them. Whatever of beauty or of deformity is there, they have given us. And it must be confessed that, if we are to judge from their respective narratives, the elements both of beauty and of deformity are thrown together in wonderful juxtaposition.

On the one hand, we have glowing accounts of the wealth and resources of the country—its gold, its silver, its various fabrics, and, what is better than all, its thrifty and rapidly increasing population, amply supplied with all that is useful or ornamental in life. That is one side of the picture.

On the other hand, we are presented with appalling images of wretchedness and woe. We hear of cruel and relentless rulers. We are told of whole tribes of men ground down by the hands of ruthless tyranny. Our very soul is harrowed up by the recital of thousands of human beings immolated, to soothe the superstition, or to glut the cupidity of a despot. In short, whatever that fairy land contains to gladden the heart, or to make it sad, we have, either now or on recent occasions, been very circumstantially informed of all.

But, sir, there is one item in its statistics, which, although it has been frequently referred to here, and has been deemed worthy of a place in a paper recently introduced to our notice, in the name and under the auspices of the Committee of Ways and Means, is not, as I apprehend, so well nor so universally understood as the rest. Gentlemen will readily conceive what it is to which I allude. It is, of course, to a certain crystalline substance, at once fair to the sight, and savory to the taste—a thing of very common use in domestic economy, and which is not unfrequently mentioned by political economists; it was once made the subject of a special lucubration by a dissertator on political economy, a friend of mine from Georgia, whom I am very sorry not to see here now; it is obtained from a beautiful oriental reed, supposed by the ancients to exude spontaneous honey, sweeter than that gathered by the bee on the mountain. When they got it in a state of concretion, they called it by a name appropriate to the dialect in use among themselves, meaning, what the homely vernacular of modern housewifery expresses by the term—I had hoped never more to speak the word here—sugar! Yet things must be named when necessary; and I trust I may not be rated for assumption, when I profess to know something more than ordinary folks about this article, seeing that I happen to live on the very spot where it is chiefly produced, and that I have an authority, from those who produce it, to speak to you about it, on the event of its being called in question here. The contingency has arrived; and I must crave indulgence while I venture a few observations on it, and on some other things. They will be pertinent, I hope. If I did not think they would, I certainly should not obtrude them; at the same time, I own that I do it with great reluctance under the circumstances. Why and wherefore speak to you about it all? To speak, one must employ speech. The object of speech is to reason. The very faculty of articulate utterance is the gift to rational beings, with face sublime, looking upward to the azure vault of heaven, to contradistinguish them from the grovelling herd to which instinct is reason, and passion law. How is it with the work we have now undertaken? For my part, I have too much reason to fear that the reason of the case is to have mighty little to do with its decision. I hear it familiarly said that the part we have to perform is not to be groping about in quest of the rationale of the measure, but to adopt the bill, and thereby save the Union. This amazes me. That this our fabric of Government, the envy and the admiration of the world, to which the eye of the oppressed of every clime, in whose breast there beats a pulse for freedom, is anxiously turned, not with the expectation of realizing the perfect likeness of the prototype, but in the fond hope of approximating to something that may resemble it, and of which we ourselves have been boasting for the last fifty years, as the very perfection of human reason, should now require for its salvation a departure from, or an oblivion of, that which at first brought together its disjointed particles, and cemented them into a harmonious whole! I confess it passes my comprehension; though there are, no doubt, many very excellent things which I do not comprehend.

I have heard it emphatically declared, in a very high place, not here, but hard by, that the repeal of the tariff was not now to be discussed as a question of political economy, but as a question of liberty. Of liberty! I was more than a little puzzled to conceive what the orator meant by "liberty," unless it were the liberty of destroying others, without benefit or emolument to one's self; the liberty of robbing us of that which will not enrich you, but will make us poor indeed.

Mr. Chairman: This creature of the brain, called liberty, seems to be a kind of Protean thing, assuming all and every shape which the fancy of any man, in any age or nation, chooses to bestow on it. On the banks of the Bosphorus, it is liberty to use the bowstring and the sack. The misbelieving Mahommedan calls it liberty to snatch from society and from freedom creation's fairer half, and consign them to solitude and seclusion in walls and guarded watch towers. Monster! thus to depreciate heaven's last best gift, stamped, as it is, with the very impress of the giver. Brightest of all that is, the radiance of their countenance gilds and hallows wherever it falls. Bereaved of its divine effulgence, the world would be a wearisome waste, where the winds would sigh no music, the opening flowers breathe no perfume. In their presence, political controversy divests itself of half its asperity, and angry disputants confess the might, the majesty of loveliness.

In some countries it is deemed liberty to ordain and to perpetuate such regulations as may best conduce to the wealth and independence of their people. In others, liberty may be thought to consist in the privilege of abrogating the resources of one's own people, in order that the foreigner may build on the ruin. It is shrewdly suspected by some that of this latter class is the kind of liberty for which we are now alarmed by a raising of bucklers. I do not say it. On the contrary, I feel thoroughly assured that, in purpose and intent, it is not such; whether it may not have some such ulterior tendency, although unadmitted in the thoughts of gentlemen, is that on which I may entertain some doubt. But no matter; I shall bear the state of the case in mind, and endeavor to make my remarks as general, and, at the same time, as succinct as I possibly can.

H. OF R.]

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. Chairman: It is now somewhat upwards of twenty-nine years—it was on the 20th of December, 1803, since, passing from the dominion of Old Spain, a Government absolute in its forms, but, so far as its action was felt by us, mild, equitable, beneficent in its administration, we became aggregated to this confederated republic. I do not say confederacy of republics. I wish to avoid in terms all idea of plurality.

It may be ultra-federalism; it may even be stigmatized as consolidationism, or by whatever other name it may be the pleasure of any one to designate it. I care not for that. I feel assured that I do but echo the sense of the universality of those who dwell where I dwell, when I say, and I say it in pride, that they at least look upon this goodly domain, called the United States of America, as their country; that they are so unrepugnant as to regard it as one of the nations of the earth, of which they are a constituent part. The glorious E pluribus unum, which waived above their heads when they stood side by side with you to do battle with the common enemy, has not yet become a mockery in their mouths. It is still, thank God, the motto of our banner, and will, I trust, continue to be emblazoned there, whenever, through time, it may be needful for us to shake out its folds upon the breeze.

Differing from the rest of our fellow-citizens in origin, in language, perhaps in habits, we do not differ from any in the steadfastness of our adherence to our common institutions, and to what we conceive to be their palladium—the much abused constitution.

This much I have deemed it proper to say, in deference as well to the temper of the times, as to the tone and character which has been given to the debate.

As I have intimated, it was on the twentieth day of December—may we never rue it—just as the sun was veering about from his grand periodical visit to the Antarctic, in the third year of the present century, when the consummation of Mr. Jefferson's master-piece of policy brought the people, of whom I am one, into your association. And what was their condition then? Why, sir, the culture of the sugar cane was already introduced among them. That richest of plants, originally bestowed by Providence on climates farther towards the sun, had been brought from its own native tropics, to become a denizen on the banks of the Mississippi. Its invaluable product was even then an object of some moment, though small and almost imperceptible, in the comparison of what it has since become.

Excluded, ipso facto, by our accession to you, from competing with it in the marts of other nations, we fancied we saw some prospect of indemnity in an already pre-existing duty here, bearing on the foreign importation pretty much in the same way, though in far inferior degree to that in which foreign restrictions would operate against our exportations. When we cast our eyes abroad upon the other nations of the globe, we saw them all hedged and fenced around with impassable barriers of restriction or of prohibition; this little duty here, we thought, promised to afford us, in time, some slight encouragement in the markets of our own newly adopted country; an encouragement which we well knew we should be enabled to requite ten, yea, a hundred fold. Under such circumstances it was that we hoisted the American flag, and embarked our fortunes in the same bottom with yourselves.

It may not be out of place here to inquire what that already pre-existing duty was. Sir, it was identically the same with that which, regardless of what your hands achieved six short months ago, and before you have tested the first experiment, you are now about once more to disturb. The impost then levied at your custom-house was two and a half cents; the ratio of duty had been the same for a series of years before we joined you. And what do we ask now? Sir, we ask nothing more at this day. We claim no part of the benefit of any of your systems of economy or of finance, as devised within the last generation. We only want to be let alone on the terms of the original association. We merely challenge the original status quo as it was before the tariff, either of 1824 or 1828, had germed in the brain of your politicians.

And can this be imputed to us as an unreasonable request? Does it spring out of any unreasonable expectation? Is there really no tacit obligation of permanency in matters of this kind? Was it not natural for us to suppose that the policy to which we were affiliated would continue to be upheld? And were we not justified in the belief, that if, in aftertimes, it should ever be deemed expedient to begin to lop off, your legislative pruning knife would be applied in preference to some other branch of the great fiscal tree, rather than to this fair bough, just at the moment when so large a portion of your people, confiding in the stability of the trunk, should have sought refuge beneath its fostering shade?

Sir, I think we had the warrant for the belief. I think it was a fair inference, deducible as well from the moral nature of man, and man's ordinary policy, as from the sentiments and opinions then entertained and expressed by those who influenced the affairs of this country. And here, though it have the novelty of an often told tale, I must beg leave to weary the committee with an instance or two of the kind of philosophy which obtained on this subject as low down as 1816.

[Mr. W. here read some extracts of debates on the tariff of 1816, showing the variation that has taken place in the sentiments of some eminent public men. He then proceeded:]

Mr. Chairman: I have alluded to the fervor with which we cherish the Union; but do you think that, if, at that day, when young, confiding, and heart-yielding, we were just consenting to wed our fortunes with yours, some vaticinating seer had been found, endued with the science of futurity, to raise his monitory voice, and say unto that people, "you are going to join the United States! Beware, oh! beware of changeable, fluctuating democracy. Now that they feel and admit the want of your assistance, they will be lavish of profession; their statute books will be illumined by enactments in your favor; but, after the lapse of some years, when you shall have accomplished for them all and more than they now expect or desire at your hands, then will you see them turn upon you with contumely and reproach. Involved in one common torrent of obloquy with yet uncreated things—things, between which, when created, and it, there will be no connexion, no affinity, your pursuit will become an object of envy, and you will be called tax-masters and plunderers. Parties will be formed with reference to one fixed idea, the words of whose war cry will be taxes! and you will live to see the day when the fate of yourselves, and of your children, will hang trembling on the issue of a call of the yeas and nays in an assembly where the propriety of laying you low at the foot of every foreign policy will come up, to be voted on in their assembly, not as a question of justice, or of political economy, but as a question of liberty!" Do you think, I say, sir, that, if there could have been some inspired Cassander to utter these warning accents, we would ever, with our own free will, have admitted the fatal horse? No, I imagine not. Kings and rulers, or their emissaries beyond the sea, might have bargained as they liked; but never, with our consent, would the insidious contrivance have passed the threshold of our citadel.

Mr. Chairman, said he, I set out with the fixed resolution not to say one word, either as a fact or as an inference, of the truth of which I should not have entire conviction. I have endeavored scrupulously to adhere to the rule, and shall continue as sedulously to observe it. This is no time for amplification. It is a time when things should be spoken of as they are; and dread would be the responsibility on him who should attempt to robe them in the hues of fiction. At a time when the public mind is busied with such momentous topics, it behooves every man representing a portion of the people, to speak as he thinks they would speak, were it possible for their united voices to find utterance in this room.

We are said to be in a crisis. I do not exactly know what that means. It is evident, however, that the signs are sinister; the citizen to whom the people have committed the trust, to see that the republic take no harm, has solemnly told us that they are. The vessel of State rocks heavily on the sea. Away, beyond the visible horizon, we fancy we can detect an undefined, a murmuring sound, as though it were the rushing of mighty waters. On the yet unrippled surface of the ocean a sullen swell is heaving, denoting commotion in the elements somewhere. What are we to do in the conjuncture? Concession? Is that the word? Must we lower away the top-hammer? Strike topmasts and topgallantmasts, and bow to the tempest? I do not believe there breathes one here who would, more cheerfully than myself, make personal sacrifice, to allay discontent, or conjure an impending storm. Would that such a poor oblation as I would be, might tend to assuage the troubled waters. If all the countless millions which it is supposed would be made to shrink and wither away beneath a prostrated tariff, were mine, you should be welcome to do with them as you choose. They should be offered up to the complaint of my fellow-citizens, free as the alms of christian charity.

But, sir, you must be aware that my mandate does not go that length; and I am glad of this occasion to say a word, by way of explanation, to the friends whom I love, and with whom it may be my misfortune to have to differ. Our mission here is to preserve, not to destroy. I, for one, have been deputed hither as a messenger to the temple of Jupiter Conservator.

What, then, are we to do? In one quarter we are told that the sine qua non is to abandon the protective policy, and abjure the principle forever. Would that relieve us from the dilemma? Would the other half, or the three-fourths of the people quietly acquiesce in it? It is affirmed they would not. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, immediately preceding me, declared they would not. By the very spell by which you would lay one troubled ghost, might you not awaken from the tomb another spectre, still more terrific than the former? You, gentlemen, who war upon the tariff, are in pursuit of a theoretic, or, at best, a prospective good: they would be threatened with immediate perdition.

To reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, there can be no objection. It is a consummation equally desired by all. The only difference, then, is as to the mode. We think it may be very easily accomplished without destruction to vested interests; that the way to go about it is perfectly simple and plain; it is no discovery of mine: take off duties from unprotected articles, leave the principal protected articles untouched; or, if you touch them, let it be tenderly, and with due regard to reason, to justice, and to the circumstances of each particular case. But for this levelling, equalizing theory, which would remove impost from sugar and from salt, from cottons and from woollens, from hemp and from iron, the greatest staple products of the nation, with the view of adding what is to be subtracted from them, to tea, coffee, and other things not of the growth or manufacture of the country, I search anxiously, I ponder on it in the stillness of night, though I fear I search in vain for some process of reasoning by which I might justify myself in giving my vote for the policy.

A frequent interrogation in relation to this topic is, "how will the bill affect you? Can you bear the proposed reduction?" Sir, that is a question to which none but that eye which sees all things at a glance, can possibly discover any satisfactory answer. Who can tell what or how much we can bear? Present a drawn dagger to one's breast, and ask him if he can bear it. Sir, men can bear anything. The persons immediately concerned, and who are the best judges, believe that the probable effect of further unfriendly legislation here will be to entail on them hopeless ruin. If it must be so; if there is to be no resting place; if the dove can find no spot on which to repose her weary pinion; if the operative mechanic and peaceful husbandman are to be the objects of eternal warfare, the value of our country is probably gone. There will, however, be one consolation, though a melancholy one: misfortune is gregarious; it likes company, and will find it. If you will cast others into the darksome abyss, they will drag you along in their declivity. As the people of the United States are one people, so, also, are their interests one and identical; and it must be a political paradox to say that the prosperity of one portion can be subverted without a corresponding infliction on the prosperity of the rest.

Mr. Chairman, said he, I will pursue the topic no further. My object is to avoid the interminable details of the tariff. The people of the United States, or such of them as desire it, may press forward to that victory over the industry of their country which they covet; they may proceed to raze its workshops and its factories, till not one stone remain on the top of another; but, if they do, they will soon have cause to mourn over what they shall achieve. The day will come when they shall bedew their own laurels with the tears of bitterness and repentance.

Mr. POLK followed. The Committee of Ways and Means, said he, have anxiously desired to draw the attention of the House to the details of this bill. They have been prepared, whenever an opportunity should be afforded, to explain the practical operation of its various provisions, and to prove, as they confidently believe they can, that it will not ruinously affect any existing interest. They have thought it to be unprofitable and worse than useless, at this time of day, to enter into any general discussion of the protective policy. The subject is perfectly familiar to every member of this body. Does any gentleman believe that any debate, however protracted, is likely to change any vote in this House, or any opinions out of it? No gentleman will affirm that he does so believe. My colleagues of the Committee of Ways and Means have abstained from any general discussion, for other reasons, which must be obvious to the House. This is the short session of Congress: our time is limited to the 3d of March; other important subjects must be acted upon before we rise. I am unwilling to believe that it can be the object of any portion of this body to defeat this great measure, by the delay occasioned by protracted, useless, and unprofitable debate; and yet it is certain that such must be the effect, if this general discussion continues. The committee would be far from precipitating, with unnecessary haste, a decision of this question; yet there must be some limit to the debate. Surely after the dozen speeches which have followed each other in regular succession, in opposition to this bill, if the object be not to defeat, by delay, any final action upon it, gentlemen will permit us to consider and vote upon its details. All the gentlemen who have addressed the House in opposition to the measure, are of the ultra high tariff portion of the House. They have dealt altogether in generals. No one of them has taken a practical view of the operation and effects of the measure itself. They seem to have been desirous to provoke debate from the friends of the bill. The committee have been censured for their silence. The measure which they have recommended to the favor of the House has been charged to be indefensible. It has been said to be a measure at once destructive of the whole manufacturing interests of the country; that ruin and desolation awaited the manufacturers if the bill on your table became a law. All this we have heard, and yet no opportunity has been afforded to us, by an examination of the bill itself, and by facts and proofs in our possession, to show that no such consequences will follow. I rise, sir, now, not to abandon the grounds we have taken. I will not be provoked, by any thing that can be said, into the general discussion of constitutional law, of protection, of free trade, or of nullification; nor shall the taunting allusions which have been made to the different characters of the free labor of the North, and the slave labor of the South, draw me into the discussion of these abstract or exciting topics.

I rise, sir, to show, not by arguments of my own, but by what must be much more satisfactory to the House, by facts the most conclusive, by the testimony of the manufacturers themselves, that the bill upon your table will produce no such effects as gentlemen roundly assert it will. Doubtless gentlemen may believe the declarations which they make; but they are mistaken, if the manufacturers testify truly, or if the facts which they state are worthy of belief.

Permit me to remark, before I adduce the testimony to which I allude, that in framing this bill the committee saw the great fact staring them in the face, that the present rates of import duty would yield to the treasury an excess of six millions of dollars annually, over what will be required, in subsequent years, to meet all the necessary and proper expenditures of the Government. The President, in his annual message, had recommended a repeal of the public burdens to this amount. The Secretary of the Treasury had also recommended it. The necessity of the reduction seemed to be conceded by all; and, indeed, in all the speeches we have heard, it has not been controverted. In preparing the bill which they have offered, the committee had two objects in view. First, to reduce the taxes to the standard of revenue which the Government required, thereby relieving the people of so much of the public burdens as were no longer needed for the public service; but in doing this they kept an eye, secondly, to the probable effects of the measure upon the existing manufacturing establishments which had grown up under the existing policy. No member of the committee who yielded his assent to this bill, I may safely affirm, desired to prostrate the manufactories, nor will such, in their judgment, be the effect of the bill. The chairman of the committee, as their organ, in bringing the measure before the House, confined himself to a brief, but very satisfactory exposition of its provisions—as a measure of finance. The duty has been devolved upon me to show its effects upon the manufacturing interests of the country. This I shall do, not by general declamation, but by the testimony of the manufacturers themselves; and I venture to affirm that the bill, so far from prostrating these establishments, affords sufficient incidental protection to enable all such as are based on real, not borrowed capital, and which are conducted with economy and skill, not only to stand under this bill, but to realize greater rates of profit upon the capital and labor employed, than is derived from any other regular business in the country.

The proof which I adduce, and to which I now ask the attention of the House, is the testimony of the manufacturers themselves, collected by the Secretary of the Treasury during the last year, in obedience to a resolution of this House, a part of which has been printed by the order of this House, and a part is yet in manuscript. Of that portion which has not been printed, I have procured some of the original statements, and will read from them to the House. From this testimony of the manufacturers—the persons of all others the best informed and most interested, so far as the measure before us is supposed to operate injuriously upon their peculiar interests—I shall expect to establish, beyond the possibility of a doubt—

1st. That the profits received by the manufacturers, in well conducted establishments, far exceed the profits upon the labor and capital employed in any other regular business.

2d. The opinions of distinguished manufacturers as to the rates of duty which will protect them against foreign competition, and as to the reductions which they can bear, and still realize a fair profit.

3d. That the manufactures of the United States were in a prosperous condition, under the act of 1816, and between the years 1816 and 1824; and that the duties imposed by the act of 1816 afforded sufficient protection.

4th. That the bill, which assumes the act of 1816 as a general basis, affords in fact greater protection than did the act of 1816.

Upon the point of profits, I call the attention of the House particularly to the manufacture of woollens and cottons, for these are the interests supposed to be more seriously affected by this bill, than any other. And, first, it is to be observed that many of the manufacturers decline or refuse to respond to the interrogatories propounded by the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to their profits, thereby leaving the inference most strongly to be drawn, that they may have been unwilling to make a full exposé, lest it might be seen that they could well bear a modification of duties, and still realize a fair profit. In confirmation of this, at page eighty-five of the printed testimony, Mr. Edward Walcott, an agent appointed by the Treasury to collect and report the information desired, in regard to the profits and condition of the manufactories at Pawtucket, states that “many of our manufacturers have been reluctant to answer some of the questions propounded, not wishing to hazard an opinion upon a subject they have not viewed in all its bearings.” This is perhaps natural enough. At page one hundred and thirty-four of the same document, an agent in Massachusetts states, in relation to the interrogatories propounded as to profits, that “no definite answer has been given to this by a single manufacturer; they have generally declined, or said, we make little or nothing.” The same thing is stated at pages one hundred and thirty-six, one hundred and forty-six, and one hundred and fifty, of this document. Others, however, of the manufacturers, have stated their profits. The first that I present is an abstract of the state and condition of the manufactories in the State of Vermont, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 4th of May last, by Mr. B. F. Bailey, an agent appointed to collect the testimony, and known, I presume, to some of the delegation from that State. From this abstract, it appears that a woollen factory, owned by Moulton and Cummings, with a capital of $22,000, consisting of real estate, machinery, and active capital, makes a profit of forty per cent. A woollen factory, owned by J. Downs, with a capital of $60,000, makes a profit of fifteen per cent. A woollen factory, owned by N. B.

Hazen, with a capital of $28,576, makes a profit of twelve per cent. Two other woollen factories, with capitals of about $10,000 each, the one owned by Sturdevant, and the other by Gookin, each make a profit of thirty-three per cent. From the same abstract, it appears that a cotton factory, owned by I. Lyman, with a capital of $55,000, realizes a profit of twenty-one per cent.; and in this case we meet with a candid admission, as appears from the statement before me, that "reduction" of duties would "not be injurious" to the establishment. The following interrogatory, among others, was propounded by the Secretary of the Treasury, to wit: "If the duty upon the foreign manufacture, of the kind of goods which you make, were reduced to twelve and a half per cent., with a corresponding reduction on all the imports, would it cause you to abandon your business, or would you continue to manufacture at reduced prices?" The answer is, "reduction not injurious." The iron foundries and forges in this State are shown, by the abstract before me, to be in a highly prosperous condition, yielding, in one instance, a profit of fifty-four per cent., and in many other establishments, profits of from twenty to forty per cent. But as it seems to be conceded by the iron masters themselves, as well as by the advocates of the restrictive policy on this floor, that this interest is amply protected by the bill, I shall make no more particular reference to the proofs of profits in relation to this interest, contained in the paper before me. I hold the proof in my hand. It is open to the inspection of any gentleman who desires to look into it. The truth is, that the cost of transportation alone, in regard to all the iron establishments situated in the interior, is ample protection. Within a given circle around them, the cost of transportation excludes the foreign article altogether; and no rates of duty, whether high or low, could materially affect them. It is upon the seaboard, and in that portion of the interior connected with the Atlantic by cheap water communication, that any competition is met from the foreign article. The other manufactories, in the State of Vermont, as well as in other portions of the Union, are suffered to remain at the rates of duty imposed by the act of 1816, which do not materially vary from the present rates. The tanneries, the saddleries, the manufacture of hats, of boots and shoes, and, in a word, the mechanic trades generally, are left in a prosperous condition, yielding, as the proof shows, handsome, and in most cases large profits. There are, I believe, no apprehensions that they will not be adequately protected by the bill. These remarks, in relation to these different kinds of manufactories, as well as to iron, sustained as they are, not only by the testimony taken in the State of Vermont, but confirmed by the testimony taken in several other States, with which I will not now trouble the House, abundantly show that these various interests are sufficiently protected, and will not be injuriously affected by this bill.

In regard to the great interests of woollens and cottons, in which so vast an amount of capital has been embarked, I beg leave to adduce further proofs, taken in different States of the Union. In the printed document, No. 308, containing the testimony taken in the States of Maine and Massachusetts, to which I have already referred, at page 22, the agent states that "satinet factories, properly conducted, will yield from fifteen to twenty per cent." The agent at Augusta, in the State of Maine, at page 1 of the printed document, in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury, states: "It is well known that Maine has not many large manufacturing establishments of any kind. In that portion of the State which I visited or examined, I found but two cotton factories, one at Winthrop, in the county of Kennebeck, and the other at Gardiner, in the same county. The agent of the former very readily answered all the inquiries put to him, within his power to answer; the result of which will be found on sheet No. 1, accompanying this; but the directors of the Gardiner factory declined answering any of them, although twice called upon by me, and once written to on the subject. I however found, by inquiry, that their operations are about one-third more than those at Winthrop, and, owing to a favorable location and other facilities for carrying on their business, their profits must have been, during the year ending September last, fully twenty-five per cent." The same agent, in his report, states that "the impression among intelligent gentlemen with whom I have conversed is, that the duty upon woollens and cottons might be advantageously reduced, and the factories still be able to carry on their business at a rate of profit considerably above what is realized in other branches of business." The agent at Portland, Maine, at page 1 of the printed document, states, that "cotton factories at the present time are very profitable; but it is expected, from the great number building, that much competition will ensue, and profits will be lessened." "In the manufacture of wool we have made less advance; but it is thought a considerable reduction may take place, and the business still continue profitable." The value of "manufacturing stocks," in well conducted establishments, affords conclusive evidence of the enormous profits which they realize. The agent at Pawtucket, in his report, at page 85 of the printed document, states that he believes "there has been more money made by speculators in manufacturing stocks than by the operations of machinery; and the safest and most profitable operations have been made by sales of stock in manufacturing corporations at an advance of from ten to fifty per cent. from the original cost." At page 172 of the printed document, it appears that an extensive cotton factory in Massachusetts, with a capital exceeding $100,000, yielded an average profit of ten and a half per cent. for ten years, from 1819 to 1828 inclusive; "that a profit of fifteen per cent. was realized in 1823;" that "the business afforded a profit of twenty per cent. in 1830, and the following year, 1831, an unusual profit was realized, say twenty-five per cent." At page 196 of the printed document, it is stated that, since 1821, the business has "afforded a handsome profit."

In the State of Pennsylvania, the manufacture of woollens and cottons is not very extensive. In document No. 158, returned by the agent, from that State, and now before me in manuscript, it appears that the woollen and cotton factory in Beaver county, Pennsylvania, owned by the "Harmonie Society," with a capital, fixed and active, of $35,000 in the "cotton line" per annum, and $62,000 in the "woollen line" per annum, yielded for the five years ending with 1831 the following profits, viz.

Profits in the cotton business. Woollen business.
June, 1827,	15 per cent.	14 per cent.
1829,	12	16
1831,	12	14

In the smaller factories engaged in the manufacture of woollens in that State, it appears, from the returns of the agents, that the several establishments, as shown by the manuscript documents before me, numbered 135, 136, 139, 143, 149, severally yield a profit of twenty per cent. per annum. The manuscript documents numbered 134, 138, 140, show an annual profit of twenty-five per cent. on the capital invested; and the documents numbered 104 and 105 show an annual profit of thirty-three per cent. on the capital invested. The documents showing these large rates of profit, are here, and any gentleman who will look into them will find these statements to be correct. In addition to this, it appears that all the fulling mills and small establishments doing custom work, and finding their market in their immediate vicinity, are exceedingly profitable, and could be but little if at all affected by a reduction of the duties. To this body of testimony in relation to profits, I have only to add the testimony of a single other manufacturer, which struck me, when I first read it, with great force. It is to be found in document No. 47, from the State of New York. Among other interrogatories propounded by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his circular addressed to the manufacturers during the last year, was the following: "Is there any pursuit in which you could engage, from which you could derive greater profits, even after the reduction of the import duties to twelve and a half per cent?"

H. OF R.]

The Tariff Bill.

This manufacturer, as appears from the document now before me, answers the interrogatory as follows: "Nothing more advantageous than shaving with the many."

The manuscript returns of the agents for the State of New York, which I have also before me, show rates of profits in the woollen and cotton business not materially varying from those already stated in the State of Pennsylvania. Here are the returns; any gentleman who desires it, can examine them for himself. These proofs and statements furnished by the manufacturers themselves, the persons of all others the most interested, and possessing certainly the best information upon the subject, accord but badly with the general declarations which we have heard so often repeated in the course of this debate, as to the depressed condition of the manufactures, and especially of the manufactures of woollens and cottons, and of the apprehended ruin and desolation which awaits them if this bill should pass. I take this testimony of the manufacturers as most strongly against the gentlemen opposed to this bill, upon the point at issue. I do so upon a well-settled principle of evidence in all judicial proceedings, that admissions of a party interested against his interest furnish the most conclusive and incontrovertible proof.

I am willing to admit that I have selected from this body of evidence the proofs which I have adduced, and to concede that, from these voluminous documents, it does appear that some other establishments, and especially those having very large capitals, have not yielded such large profits, and that some even have been ruinous concerns; but this does not weaken or impair the positive affirmative testimony which has been adduced. If one manufacturer, with skill, vigilance, and economy, can realize a given rate of profit in his business, there is no reason why another, in similar circumstances, may not do so. In all the establishments where there is the requisite skill in the business, a real, and not a borrowed capital, and wherever the latest improvements in labor-saving machinery are introduced, and proper economy and attention given to the business, large profits have been realized. But wherever there is a want of skill in the business, wherever it is based upon a fictitious capital borrowed from banks or individuals, or wherever there is a want of economy or proper attention to the business, it cannot be expected to be otherwise than calamitous. In some establishments too, large and even ruinous losses have been sustained in consequence of bad debts, or by fire or floods. Against these, were the duties prohibitory, no legislation can afford protection. They can only be guarded against by the vigilance and attention of the owners. The general proposition which I affirm to be established by the whole body of this testimony is, that in all those establishments, where there is skill, real capital, improved machinery, and proper economy and vigilance in their management, they have proved to be more profitable than any other regular and steady business.

Having now produced the testimony of the manufacturers in relation to the profits realized in many well-conducted establishments, and shown, I trust satisfactorily, to the House, that these rates exceed the rewards of labor and capital employed in any other regular business, I call the attention of the House next to the testimony and opinions of distinguished manufacturers as to the reduction of the duties on the rival foreign article which they can bear, and still pursue their business, realizing fair profits. The first testimony which I adduce upon this point, is that of Mr. Peter H. Schenck, of the State of New York, to be found in document No. 21. Mr. Schenck is extensively engaged in the manufacture of broadcloths and other woollen goods. He is personally known to many members of this body, and perhaps by reputation to all. The Secretary of the Treasury propounded, among other interrogatories to the manufacturers, the following: "What rate of duty is necessary to enable the manufacturer to enter into competition in the home market with similar articles imported?" To this Mr. Schenck answers in the following words: "Having all the materials at as low a rate as the foreigner, twenty-five per cent. duty on the imported article will be a protection, if the duty is fully collected, not as heretofore, (scarcely the half of it.)" To the same question, Messrs. I. & L. Wadsworth, manufacturers of woollens, in the State of New York, (as may be seen in document No. 23,) answer: "Twenty-five per cent., was the duty on wool to be reduced in proportion, and the value of the imported article to be fixed here." Messrs. Bour & Kirk, manufacturers of woollens, in the State of New York, answer the same interrogatory as follows, (document No. 22:) "Twenty-five per cent. on the goods valued in this country; then there will be no need of false invoices and false oaths." In document No. 30, the same interrogatory is answered by a manufacturer of woollens, in New York, as follows, to wit: "Cannot say; but the rate of duty is, perhaps, not so essential as that it should be strictly collected upon all the goods entered, as fraudulent entries keep the market constantly in an unsettled state, and the manufacturer is left in uncertainty whether he is to make or lose money by his operations." I shall only detain the House upon this point by adducing the testimony of a single manufacturer of cottons, (to be found in document No. 3,) in the State of New York. In answer to the interrogatory of the Secretary of the Treasury: "If the duty upon the foreign manufacture, of the kind of goods which you make, were reduced to twelve and a half per cent. would it cause you to abandon your business, or would you manufacture at reduced prices?" The manufacturer answers that he "should continue the business at twelve and a half per cent."

It appears from this testimony that the duties upon woollens (now fifty per cent.) may not only be reduced, but that twenty-five per cent. will be a sufficient protection, provided there be a corresponding reduction on the raw material, and the duty be fully and fairly collected; and that the manufacturers of cottons, and especially of coarse cottons, would be able to continue their business profitably at the reduced duty of twelve and a half per cent. on the rival foreign article. Now, sir, this bill proposes not only a corresponding reduction upon raw wool, but makes free of duty many of the raw materials heretofore paying heavy duties, and which are of indispensable necessity in the manufacture of woollens. For instance, the article of indigo, paying a duty of fifty per cent. under the tariff of 1828, is, by the bill, made free of duty. The various dye-woods are made free of duty by the act of 1832. Olive oil, upon which the duty is reduced from twenty-five to ten cents the gallon (more than half) by this bill. The extent of the gain to the manufacturer, by the reduction of duty upon the raw material used by him, will be more particularly stated when I come to adduce the testimony upon another branch of this subject.

In confirmation of these opinions, and in support of the general proposition that the woollen and cotton manufactures can bear a considerable reduction of the present rate of duties upon the foreign rival article, and still be able to continue their business with fair profits, and without being seriously affected by the reduction, I beg leave to read an extract or two from the report of the agent appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to collect and report the testimony in relation to the condition of the various kinds of manufactures in the State of New York. The report from which I read, bears date on the 17th of April, 1832. The agent states that "the woollen would appear more likely to be benefited by a reduction of the duties upon all the imports than any other branch of manufacture, because wool pays not only a specific duty, relatively high as the prime cost is low, but also a high ad valorem duty; and also because oil and other articles which enter into this manufacture, pay a duty exceeding the proposed limitation." The limitation here alluded to is a uniform ad valorem duty of twelve and a half per cent. on all imports. The report proceeds: "The woollen manufacture would, therefore, seem better able to bear a reduction of duty on the imported rival articles, with such a corresponding reduction on other imports as is proposed, than either iron or cotton, excepting coarse cottons, on which the duty is considered merely nominal. Mr. Dexter, an experienced woollen manufacturer, concurs in the opinion that a reduction might be made on imported woollens, if the duties on wool and other materials used in the manufacture were also reduced." With a view to show the general effects of a reduction of duties upon all imports, I read also the following extracts from this report, to wit: "With regard to the reduction of duties upon that class of imports referred to as falling upon all in proportion to numbers, as teas, sugar, coffee, articles of clothing, and every thing coming under the denomination of necessities or comforts, within the reach of the laboring classes, the iron manufacture would be benefited to a higher degree than cotton and woollen, because manual labor is employed to a greater extent in the former, and machinery to a greater extent in the two latter." And, again: "How far a reduction of duty on all imports to twelve and a half per cent. would affect the cotton, iron, and woollen manufactures, by affording articles of consumption at a lower price, is a question of extreme difficulty. Nothing but experience can satisfactorily determine it; but, in the present condition of the woollen manufacture, there is reason to believe that it would be the first and severest sufferer, notwithstanding a reduction of duty on the raw material; and there is equal reason to believe that the cotton manufacture would suffer less than any other." In regard to the manufacture of the coarse cotton goods, it is generally conceded that, with the aid of labor-saving machinery, they have already attained such a degree of protection that they require no protecting duties to sustain them; that the duty is "nominal merely, as the domestic manufacture is exported, and the foreign, of the same description, is never imported;" that we are able to meet and successfully compete with the British manufacturer in the foreign market. In regard to cottons, the report before me states that "the cotton manufacturers are opposed to the removal of the duty upon foreign goods of the same description as those which they produce. Although they believe they are able to compete in the manufacture of coarse cottons with the British manufacturers, they are apprehensive that a reduction of the duty to a considerable extent on the imported, might induce the latter to attempt to break them down by sending large supplies into the United States, and vending them at a present loss with a view to an ultimate gain, and that their vast superiority of capital would give them great advantages in such a contest. At all events they apprehend that much temporary individual embarrassment and loss might ensue, without any permanent gain to the public." This is the leading objection of the cotton manufacturers to a reduction of duty, stated with all its force; and the following is the very satisfactory and conclusive answer which the agent in the report gives to it: "It is believed that the difficulty of apportioning such temporary loss among the foreign manufacturers in proportion to their ultimate gain, is so great as to afford effectual security against this evil." There is another objection (which we have often heard upon this floor) stated, and very satisfactorily answered in this report. It is this: "The apprehension in which so many of the cotton manufacturers concur, that a foreign article, equal in appearance but inferior in quality to theirs, might compete successfully with theirs, appears to me" [says the agent] "quite groundless. Such an article would, in my opinion, find its market value controlled by quality." An argument was stated in the committee which reported this bill, against the reduction of duty on cottons to the extent proposed in the bill, though it was admitted that they could bear some reduction. It was this: It was said that there was a kind of cotton, grown in the East Indies, inferior in quality to the American cottons, which was sold in the English markets at a cent and a half in the pound less than the American cottons, and that, in consequence of this, coarse cottons could be manufactured for less abroad than here, where the American cottons were exclusively used. The objection was believed to have nothing in it, for many of the coarser cotton goods in this country are made of the stained or inferior cotton, worth less in our own, as well as in foreign markets, than our prime uplands. But, to remove the objection, if there was any thing in it, a provision was inserted in the bill removing the present duty on cotton imported into the United States, and permitting it to come in free of duty. Our cotton planters have never regarded the duty on raw cotton as of any consequence. They wish an open and unrestricted market for their crops, and if they have this they are able to compete with the world either in the home or the foreign market.

I propose next to establish, by testimony equally entitled to credit, the third proposition, which is, that the manufactures of the United States were in a prosperous condition under the act of 1816, and for the eight years intervening between the years 1816 and 1824, and also that the act of 1816 afforded them ample incidental protection. To establish this proposition, I call the attention of the House to the testimony of the manufacturers, taken under oath before a committee of this House in 1828, preceding the passage of the tariff act of that year. Gentlemen may find this testimony in the second volume of the "Reports of Committees, first session twentieth Congress." The following interrogatory was propounded by the Committee on Manufactures to Colonel James Shepherd, of Massachusetts, a gentleman extensively engaged in the manufacture of woollens, to wit: "Were not manufacturers of woollens generally doing a better business previous to 1824 than they have done since; and were they not then doing well?" He answers: "They were, as far as my knowledge extends. We were doing a better business previous to the tariff of 1824 than we have done since. Previous to the tariff of 1824 I think the business was a fair business, and nothing more." To a similar interrogatory, Mr. Abraham Marland, also a manufacturer, residing in Essex county, Massachusetts, answers: "I think the business previous to 1824 was better than it was in 1825 and 1826: my business certainly was." William R. Dickinson testifies that "the manufacturers of woollens in this country were doing a better business previous to the year 1824 than they have done since." Other witnesses examined before the committee testify to the same facts, and also that the business was profitable. Independent of this positive testimony, the known fact, derived from the statistics of that period, that during eight years intervening between the act of 1816 and the increased tariff of 1824, the capital invested in manufactures had increased more than one-third, goes conclusively to show not only that the business of manufacturing was prosperous, but that the incidental protection afforded by the act of 1816 was sufficient to sustain all the well-conducted establishments. We have, then, eight years of actual experience under the act of 1816. It is not a mere theory or conjecture. The fact is established that the manufacturers were doing well. If this be so, is there any sound reason why they may not still do well under the same rates of duty which were then sufficient to protect them? On the contrary, is there not every reason to believe that even a less rate of duty would now be sufficient? Many of the establishments were then in their infancy; they are now firmly established, and, since that period, great improvements have been made in labor-saving machinery. Immediately after the war, during the years 1816 and 1817, it is well known that real estate, sites for water-power, machinery, and labor, were dearer than they now are. And if under all these disadvantages the business was profitable, can there be any reason, if we now return to the rates of 1816, (as this bill proposes to do,) why it should not still be so? Under the act of 1816 none but real capitalists and persons of skill embarked in the business. The raw materials used were subject to the payment of but light duties, nor were the rates of import on foreign manufactured articles so high as to hold out inducements to smuggle, or otherwise evade the payment of the duties. But, under the higher rates of duty imposed by the tariffs of 1824 and 1828, many persons, upon borrowed capital and without skill, were induced to engage in the business, with the hope of realizing large profits. By these acts also, heavier duties were imposed upon the raw material, as well as upon the manufactured article, thereby absorbing, in the duties paid upon the raw material, a portion of the profits which the manufacturer would otherwise have made. The inducements to evade the revenue laws were also greatly increased, and the faithful collection of the duties rendered much more difficult. And although the protection afforded was greater, yet from all these causes the business was rendered more uncertain and unsteady than it was under the act of 1816.

I have stated that the bill before us affords to the manufacturers even greater protection than did the act of 1816. The committee, it is true, in framing this bill, have assumed the act of 1816 as a general basis; but they have permitted to remain undisturbed the duties upon those articles which, by the act of 1832, were reduced below the rates of 1816. Among these are the dyestuffs generally, now made free of duty, and which, under the act of 1816, but to a still greater extent under the acts of 1824 and 1828, were burdened with the payment of duty. By the bill, the duty upon indigo is repealed; upon olive oil it is reduced; and upon raw wool the duty is reduced to the rates of 1816; thus relieving the manufacturer from the burden of a great part of the high duty heretofore paid upon the raw material. By a repeal of the duty upon indigo, and all the dyestuffs, and a reduction upon oil, and the raw material, the amount of the duties no longer required from him, and which he is thereby permitted to retain, goes to swell the profits of his business. The amount thus saved to the manufacturer by this repeal and reduction upon articles of indispensable necessity in his business, and which he is compelled to have, under any rate of duty which may be imposed, is a clear profit afforded to him by the bill; an advantage which he has not heretofore enjoyed under either the acts of 1816, 1824, or 1828. The amount thus saved, in the shape of duties, below the rates of the act of 1828, without including in the estimate the reduction upon wool, is equal to about six per cent. upon the whole capital invested in the woollen factories, and, including the reduction of duty upon that portion of the wool imported, is equal to about eleven per cent. I am enabled to make this general estimate of the saving to the manufacturer, by the repeal or reduction of these duties, (which, if not entirely accurate, is a sufficient approximation, for my general purpose,) from a statement made by a distinguished and experienced manufacturer of woollens, before the committee of this House, in 1828. His whole capital invested in real estate, machinery, and active capital, was $130,000. He manufactured annually 46,084 yards of broadcloth. He consumed in the manufacture of this quantity of cloth, among other articles burdened with the payment of duty, 4,705½ pounds of Bengal indigo, costing $11,293 20. The duty upon indigo, by the act of 1828, was fifty per cent.; making the amount of duty paid upon this article $5,646 60; indigo, by the bill, is to be free of duty; and this much the manufacturer is enabled to add to his profits. A similar statement is also made of the quantity and cost of olive oil, castile soap, dyewood, copperas, vitriol, and wood used in the establishment, all paying duty; but by the bill either made free of duty, or the rates greatly reduced. If any gentleman will take the trouble to make the calculation of the rate per cent. of these duties upon the capital invested, he will find the result to be about as I have stated it. In this establishment also, 102,159 pounds of wool are used, of which 31,740 pounds are of foreign production; and calculating the duty upon its foreign cost, by the rates of the act of 1828, the rate per cent. of the duty paid on wool added to the duties paid upon other articles consumed, as already stated, upon the whole capital invested, will be about eleven per cent. The whole duty on wool is not repealed; it is by the bill reduced to fifteen per cent. ad valorem, which was the duty by the act of 1816. By the act of 1823, it paid a duty of four cents the pound specific, and also a duty of fifty per cent. ad valorem. But though a reduction upon wool will be advantageous to the woollen manufacturers, it is objected that it will be injurious to the wool growers. Upon this point the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, presents the following view:

"By the act of the 14th of July last, the anomaly in the tariff of the United States, by which heavy and burdensome duties were imposed upon the raw material, and especially upon the article of wool, was continued; and the necessity was thereby created, of retaining upon the manufactured articles a higher degree of protection than would otherwise have been necessary. An adherence to this anomaly, instead of equalizing the burdens of the people, augments that of the consumer, by increasing the number of favored classes. Proper attention to the facility and cheapness of producing, and the amount actually produced of the raw material in the United States, and an examination of the information collected by this department, and transmitted to the House of Representatives at their last session, will show that, in the extension of manufactures, and in the augmentation of a sure market, the producer of the raw material has long since been in a condition to dispense with a great portion of the protection heretofore afforded. By the same information it will further appear that, by relieving the manufacturer from the burden of the high duty upon the raw material, the existing duties may be very materially reduced, and gradually removed, consistently with a just regard to the interests which have so long enjoyed the advantages of the protective system.

"By these considerations, and the proud and gratifying fact that there no longer exists any public debt requiring the present amount of revenue after the ensuing year, the question is submitted to the Legislature, whether they will continue to raise from the people of the United States six millions of dollars annually beyond any demand of the public service, that favors, which have been so long enjoyed, and which may soon be dispensed with, without detriment to the national safety or independence, may be indefinitely continued."

The wool growers consider the duty upon foreign wool as important to their prosperity. This opinion, I apprehend, is founded in error. Very little wool of the middling quality, such as we produce, is imported. The kinds chiefly imported are either the coarse South American wool, costing eight cents and under, the pound, or the fine Saxony wool, costing more than a dollar the pound; neither of which do we produce, or, if we do, to a very limited extent. The wool of middling quality used in our factories is almost exclusively of domestic growth. Mr. Aaron Tufts, a witness examined before the Committee on Manufactures in 1828, testifies that the depreciation in the price of domestic wool is caused by the low price of woollen goods; and as to the effect of the importation of foreign wool, he says: "I do not think this tends in the least to depreciate the price of the domestic wool;" and the reason assigned for this opinion is, that wool was so high a price, that "if none was imported, we could pay no higher price." The same witness testifies that the duty on wool is of no consequence to the "farming interest, unless you can enable the manufacturers to furnish the farmer a market." He also advances the opinion that the "repeal of the British duty on exported wool cannot affect the price of wool imported here, because we can obtain it from other European countries;" and further states his belief that "not a pound of wool of British growth is ever brought into the United States." And yet we have heard it urged in the course of this debate, that the repeal of the British export duty rendered our import duty necessary to protect the wool grower. Colonel James Shepherd, a large wool grower, owning from "1,200 to 1,400 sheep," also testified before the Committee on Manufactures in 1828, that he considered the duty laid on foreign wool by the act of 1824, as striking at the foundation of the manufacturing system. "I am," he states, "of opinion that if the duty laid on foreign wool had not been more than one-fourth what it was, wool growers and manufacturers would have both done better. I am of opinion, also, that imported wool has no effect on the price of domestic wool. I prefer the latter whenever I can procure it, to any that is imported." He also considers the duty of no importance to the farming interests. Other witnesses, some of them wool growers, also concur in these opinions. So far as the interests of the wool growers are concerned, I think we are justified, therefore, in coming to the conclusion, that the idea that the duty is a protection to them is a mere delusion. But if it be important, surely the duty of fifteen dollars on each hundred dollars worth imported, imposed by this bill, affords them sufficient advantages over the foreigner. My own opinion is that wool should be duty free; but as wool growers think otherwise, we have retained a revenue duty of fifteen per cent. upon the imported article. The duty upon woollens, and also upon wool, are antagonist or conflicting duties, if the effect of the duty upon the latter be to enhance the price of the wool to the manufacturer; for if the price of the wool be enhanced, the effect must be either to diminish the profits of the manufacturer, and render less availing the protection of his fabric, or to enhance the price of the manufactured article to the wool grower as well as all other consumers.

I have confined myself, Mr. Chairman, to an examination of the proofs afforded by these documents, and the obvious inferences from them in relation to the great interests of woollens and cottons, because the complaints were loudest against the apprehended effects of this bill upon these particular interests. I invite gentlemen to answer the testimony of these manufacturers, not by general declarations, which they no doubt sincerely believe; but by facts and by proof. They must not—they cannot discredit those witnesses, because they are the persons whose interest they so zealously advocate upon this floor; and because they are the persons most interested; and when they testify to facts against their interest, and going directly to disprove the predictions of ruin and distress, which await them if this bill pass, what they say is to be taken as true.

I could go on to adduce testimony from these documents in regard to other branches of manufacture, showing similar results; but I have already detained the House much too long, and much longer than I intended to have done. My chief purpose in rising was to bring to the view of the House this testimony, as a full answer to many of the arguments we have heard in opposition to this bill.

I submit, then, to the House, whether, from these proofs of profits, the opinion of manufacturers of the reductions they can bear, and the condition of their establishments under the act of 1816, it be true that this bill, some of the provisions of which are even more favorable to them than was the act of 1815, is likely to produce the serious effects which its opponents anticipate; and whether it be not also true that the facts here adduced fully sustain the opinion advanced by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, "that, in a tariff framed on proper principles, the reduction of six millions now recommended may, for the most part, be made upon those commonly denominated protected articles, without prejudice to the reasonable claims of existing establishments." Objections have been stated to this bill, because of the different rates of duty which are imposed on different kinds of manufactures. It is said, for example, that it affords greater protection to iron, than to some other manufactures, and that it is therefore unjust. Sir, the same objection might be made to any revenue or tariff law that has ever passed, in all of which discriminating duties have been imposed. If the committee had brought forward a bill, proposing a uniform ad valorem, the complaints would have been much louder from the same quarter. The committee, in deliberating upon the bill which they would present, had several plans before them, and they have brought forward this bill as a measure of compromise, likely to unite in its support a sufficient number of those representing upon this floor the conflicting interests of different portions of the Union, to carry it through the House. They adopted as their basis, in framing it, the act of 1816; varying from that act in few instances, except in relation to the duties upon those articles which, by the act of 1832, were made either free of duty, or reduced below the rates of the act of 1816. They were the more induced to do this, because the requisite revenue would be produced by it; and because the condition of the country, at the date of the act of 1816, was in some respects similar to the present. The act of 1816 was an act to reduce the rates from the double duties of the war to a revenue standard. The debt being now paid, and the present rates of duty yielding more revenue than we need, this is also a bill to reduce to the same standard. There was a further reason for adopting this plan, and that was, that the operations of the act of 1816 upon the various interests supposed to be affected by it, had been tested by actual experience.

The measure we recommend is demanded alike by the state of the finances, and the condition of the country. We have six millions of revenue from the impost, more than we need; and how shall we be justified to our constituents, if we fail to relieve them of burdens to so great an amount, no longer required for the public service? Our condition is indeed anomalous. Whilst the great difficulty encountered in every age, by the rulers of every other civilized country in the world, has been to collect from their subjects money enough, in the shape of taxes, to meet the demands of the Government, our trouble is to effect a repeal of taxes, which we no longer need. The condition of the country, also, demands the adoption of the measure before us. It is no longer, in my judgment, a question of cent. per cent., but a question of patriotism and of country. Let us then act like statesmen, and, by adopting this measure of justice, endeavor to heal the discontents so prevalent in so many States, and thus preserve and perpetuate our glorious Union, without force, civil war, or the effusion of blood. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McKENNA] attributes an unworthy motive, when he supposes that the advocates of this bill have taken counsel of their fears. Not so. It is recommended by every consideration of public policy. If the public mind was unexcited, it would still be proper to adopt it. We are called upon to remove "unnecessary burdens" from the people, and to do it now; and shall we be restrained from doing what is right in itself, from the apprehension that our motives may be misunderstood or misrepresented? Shall we be so weak as to put ourselves upon an ideal point of honor; turn a deaf ear to the peaceable and constitutional complaints of seven or eight States, asking it at our hands, and refuse their request? The Secretary of the Treasury recommends it. The President, in his opening message, at the beginning of the session, recommends it, and not only recommends it, but invites the action of Congress upon the subject at this time. No one will suppose that he has taken counsel of his fears. In his late message, the President reiterates this recommendation, in the following striking and strong terms: "The crisis undoubtedly invokes the fidelity of the patriot and sagacity of the statesman; not more in removing such portions of the public burden as may be unnecessary, than in preserving the good order of society, and in the maintenance of well-regulated liberty." It is made the duty of the President, "from time to time, to give the Congress information of the state of the Union, and to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." This duty he has faithfully performed. The Executive Government possesses no legislative powers. We, and we alone, can remove these "unnecessary burdens" from the people, and we must be responsible for all the consequences which may follow from a failure at this time to act upon this great subject. If we shall rise without passing this, or some similar measure not materially varying from it, this Congress will owe a responsibility to the country, and perhaps to posterity, in which I have no ambition to participate.

The committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 22.

MANUFACTURES, &c.

The resolutions offered by Mr. ADAMS, calling for certain information from the Secretary of the Treasury, and requesting other details from the President of the United States, coming up again for consideration,

Mr. A. resumed the course of his remarks, which had yesterday been suspended by the expiration of the hour appropriated to the consideration of resolutions, and, after recapitulating the reasons he had before given why he could not consent to modify his resolutions, as had been requested by Mr. STEWART, he then observed, that since he had offered his resolutions, very strong additional reasons had presented themselves in favor of adopting them. Resolutions had been laid before the House from two most respectable State Legislatures, utterly disapproving of the bill now reported to the House by the Committee of Ways and Means, and on precisely the ground referred to in these resolutions, viz. the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the revenue might be reduced six millions (in addition to all the reduction effected by the bill of the last session) without injury to the just claims of existing establishments. These Legislatures held, that so far from its being true that the bill would operate a reduction of the revenue without incurring existing establishments, it would, if it should become a law, operate the ruin of many of those establishments, without any certainty that it would reduce the revenue at all. In the Legislature of the powerful State of Pennsylvania, the resolutions had passed by an almost unanimous vote. Was this no reason in favor of the resolutions he had offered? Was it no reason that the House should call upon the Secretary to specify; to say what were the articles on which this great reduction would be effected without injury, and how it was to be effected?

Mr. VERPLANCK here moved the orders of the day, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WYNN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, rose. He said he felt bound by a sense of duty paramount to all other considerations, to address the committee at this time. It should be his endeavor to speak with plainness and candor upon the principles of the tariff generally, and of the bill before them, and of some of its details, and of course his remarks would be desultory.

The tariff bill we are now considering, said Mr. R., is a most extraordinary measure; a measure which neither wisdom, foresight, nor experience could have anticipated. A large portion of our last session was devoted to examining and preparing a tariff, which became a law on the 14th day of July last. Without good and sufficient cause, we are now called upon to make a new tariff, and supersede and annul the act of July. Such a case never before occurred under our Government, and our constituents could not, and did not expect it now, and have had no opportunity to instruct and advise us as to their desires or interest, and point out the practical evils (which they alone can know) that may result from the proposed bill.

The enterprise of our citizens has been, in some measure, paralyzed, and our country generally has suffered serious evil from frequent innovation in our revenue laws. Importers of merchandise are often compelled to seek relief here, from the improvidence or injustice of our own legislation.

It has been said our system of revenue laws, or tariff, has been modified and changed as often as once in four years. Instance the tariffs of 1816, 1818, 1824, 1828, 1832. These changes, in my judgment, have been quite too frequent. But now we have arrived at a period in our affairs, called a crisis; and we are called upon to act, to immediately pass a new tariff, to repeal the act of July, before it goes into effect.

During the last session, the Committee on Manufactures devoted months to the most careful and minute examination and investigation of the various interests of the country, and of their claims for protection and encouragement. The tariff bill, formed on principles of protection against foreign nations, assessed duties in such manner as to secure our own interest. That bill, the result of much labor of the committee, was introduced to this House, and underwent a severe examination. Many amendments were made, and every cent of addition or diminution was decided by ayes and noes. Our journal is filled with many pages of the records of our votes. The bill was finally perfected agreeably to our judgment, passed the ordeal of this House and the Senate by a vast majority, and was signed by the President, and became a law. This law, so solemnly and deliberately, and by so great a majority passed, we are called upon to repeal.

The law passed in July will take effect on the 1st of March, 1833; soon as practicable, consistent with the good faith of the Government, plighted to those whose interest might be affected by the operation of the new tariff. But we are solemnly and earnestly exhorted to supersede that act, and prevent its operation. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the act of July. More, sir: I labored in and out of this House to facilitate the passage of that law. I acted with an ardent desire and hope of compromising this vexed and most vexing subject, and satisfying the South and the whole country. When the vote was finally taken, and the majority was known, and it was also known from whence those gentlemen came, and who they were, who voted for the law, it was considered a permanent adjustment of the system. I little imagined we should be called upon in five short months to pass a new act repealing the former one, to use the language of a gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. INGRAMS], before the ink was dry. But innovation and restless discontent are the order of the day, and we must be subject to such evils, and learn to endure them with patience and firmness.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The Committee of Ways and Means, in their report, inform us, that "to this annual amount of fifteen millions the revenue must be reduced." Again, speaking of the excess of revenue, the committee observe that "this excess, in the opinion of the committee, should be reduced by the present Congress, at the present time." Again: "The only sources of revenue on which the committee propose to rely, are the public lands and the customs." "The public lands, at the present system of sale, may now safely be calculated as producing an annual income of two millions and one-half. Then there remains to be raised by the imports upon foreign merchandise, to meet all other charges and contingencies, &c. the sum of twelve millions and one-half."

I make no remarks upon the subject of the public lands. It has been sufficiently noticed by others. Surely, sir, the committee have not given us much light in their report as to the details of the bill. The chairman of the committee seems to presume the subject is understood; and another gentleman on the committee [Mr. WILKS] informs us that "majorities vote, and minorities talk." Be it remembered that we, the present Congress, after a labor of six months, adopted the tariff of July last; that, in forming that act, we had all the aid of the gentlemen of the Committee of Ways and Means; that we had five out of seven of their votes for the bill. But neither the votes of the committee, nor the votes of this House, seem to settle the question for a single year.

What new light has beamed upon the minds of the committee since July? If they possess light or knowledge upon the subject, new or old, why do they refuse to impart it?

Sir, in my opinion, the leading and controlling objects of all our tariffs have of late been, in some measure, lost sight of and forgotten. One might be led to suppose that these laws, called tariffs, had been passed mainly to encourage and protect manufactures. This is not true. I deem it of importance in this debate, and at all times, that the truth, and the whole truth, touching this important subject, should be before us and the nation. I ask your attention, sir, and the attention of the committee, for a few minutes, and I will endeavor to correct this error, and present the facts in the case from my observation and knowledge.

Our revenue laws, so far as they have been protective, have mainly regarded the great agricultural interests, and the raw materials and productions of our extensive country. To bring these productions into use, and to secure for them a market and fair price, has been the great end and aim of the protective system. Manufactures and navigation and commerce have received the aid and support of Government, as secondary and subsidiary to those great interests. The manufactures have been encouraged, sustained, and supported, because they afforded a sure and extensive market for the corn, the flour, the meat, the wool, the cotton, the hemp, the iron, the lead, the coal, &c., of our country. Yes, sir, I repeat it; it was a union of these great and controlling interests that gave manufactures (with few exceptions) life and being, and protection and encouragement. As I view this subject as one of great importance, I will endeavor, in few words, to illustrate these positions. Take, for example, the woollen manufactures. To whom are they indebted for the aid and protection they have received? Is it not to the wool grower? Would the Merino and Saxony sheep, upon a thousand hills, hailed on their arrival here as a signal blessing of Providence, be of any value to the farmer, or the country, if their wool could not be used? If foreign wool is brought into the country, and sold in the form of cloth, native wool will not be wanted. Then, if we would wear and use our native wool, it must be here manufactured. To induce skill and capital to adventure in the woollen manufactures, they must receive encouragement and protection. They have received it from the farmer and wool grower, through their Representatives. But another serious difficulty has occurred. Woollens are not only manufactured cheaper in Europe, but wool can be afforded cheaper, and we are compelled, in the first instance, to protect the farmer himself, by a heavy duty on wool. If we would protect him effectually, we must go further, and lay a corresponding duty on the importations of woollens, and sustain the manufactures, or his wool will be useless, and the wool grower and wool manufacturer will both be involved in one common ruin.

Mr. Chairman, as another example, I take cotton. It has been my good or ill fortune to have been a member of this House when the tariffs of 1816, 1824, 1828, and 1832, were passed. I know, as far as I have been capable of learning, from the closest attention and observation, the motives and causes that influenced men to act. I ask, would the law of 1816, affording so great encouragement to the manufactures of cotton, have passed this House or the Senate, but for the raw cotton of our own country? I think not. I well know the leading and influential men who reported and sustained that bill in this House. Colonel Pickering, and others, who represented the commerce in cottons, remonstrated loudly against the protection afforded to coarse cottons: but they remonstrated in vain. They contended that the law was unjust and oppressive to the importer of India cottons, and to the consumer. They exhibited to this House the invoices of India cottons, showing that the price in India did not exceed six or seven cents per square yard; and contended that the minimum in that bill, estimating and taking every square yard to have cost twenty-five cents, was unjust, inasmuch as it did not, in fact, cost a fourth part of that sum; that a tax of 25 per cent., estimating the square yard to have cost four times as much as it cost in fact, would assess a tax of 100 per cent. It was urged that a very considerable capital had been invested in the traffic, and many merchants were engaged in the importation of those cottons, and profitably engaged; that, if the bill passed, it would put an end to their business, and greatly enhance the price to consumers. What answer was then given by Messrs. Lowndes, Calhoun, and others? As well as I remember, it was this: We regret that any interest or portion of the country should suffer, but public policy, and the true interest of the whole country, require it. What answer more favorable, in defence of that measure, could be given?

Sir, I was opposed to the act of 1816, and especially to the minimum principle. I thought it cruel, at least, to those whose employment must be utterly destroyed. I confess I did not then anticipate that our own country would soon be able to manufacture cloth of far superior character to the India fabric, and for half or one-third the price we were then paying for the India cottons. It has been done. But, sir, those gentlemen who voted for that minimum, fixed their hands and seals forever to an instrument that sustains and supports the protective policy in its most offensive character, if, indeed, it be offensive. On the vote to strike out that minimum, (I refer to the Journal,) I think there were six votes against striking out from South Carolina, and a number from Virginia, and other Southern States. But the times change, &c. Since the passage of that law, the manufactures have been successful; immense capital has been invested, and they have been greatly improved and extended. My policy is to protect and preserve them. Those who differed, and have changed their views, will give their own reasons for abandoning an enterprise whose success has outstripped the most sanguine hopes of the warmest imagination. Think you, South Carolina, and those distinguished men who then had so much influence in the councils of our nation, would have imposed such duties, but for the desire and hope, and fixed purpose of inducing the country, and especially New England, to manufacture their cotton, protected by a duty of three cents per pound, and thereby exclude the cotton of India imported in the fabric? I will not intimate they intended harm or permanent injury to us; but I most firmly believe they did intend permanent benefit and security to themselves. There was at that time a good deal said about Great Britain going to India, Egypt, and Brazil, for their cotton. I believe, from what I then saw and heard, that our Southern brethren thought it expedient to secure the home market for their cotton. The measure succeeded. The factories, which were auxiliary to the policy, have been brought into existence and successful operation.

The Tariff Bill.

So in regard to the various manufactures of iron from the bar and pig. A heavy duty was laid on the iron, to encourage the manufacturers in the interior, as there were few on the seaboard; and as the expense of transportation is greater than from Europe, the price has been enhanced. So of coal, to encourage the mining, and railroads and canals to bring it from the mountains in the interior, it is heavily taxed. I have now a letter from a constituent, who has imported a cargo from Nova Scotia, and paid for the coal three dollars per chaldron, and two dollars and sixteen cents duty on the same. These iron manufacturers and coal miners have been encouraged to bring into use our own iron and coal. But our coal and iron are dearer than European iron and coal; and those who use them, and the smiths, and those who work in iron, must have a corresponding encouragement and protection. So of lead. Shall we bring into use our own lead for paints, and the manufacturing of glass, or purchase those articles in Europe? The manufactures of glass are more perfect in this country than in any other. Our skill is fully equal, and the materials better; but the lead of Missouri, and coal of Virginia, the most material articles, cost more than in Europe. Shall we use our sand, and coal, and lead, and potash, and manufacture our own glass? If so, the manufacturers must have some protection. Or shall we leave our coal and lead in the mines, and purchase our glass in Europe? If so, of one thing we are sure; we cannot exchange lead for glass, or carry coal to Liverpool or Newcastle. Unless the present bill be amended, the glass factories must be utterly destroyed.

Mr. Chairman, when our constitution was adopted, it was understood revenue would and must be raised by direct taxation. The constitution fixes the basis upon which that taxation should be assessed; and, by a compromise, infinitely the most important in the instrument, it was agreed that the South should have three-fifths as much political power, on account of their slaves, as if they were free citizens. Direct taxation was founded upon representation. But we have had but three direct taxes since the Government was formed. The taxes paid on account of slaves is very small in amount; and of that little their owners were relieved, in some measure, by a special provision in the act of July last, in favor of negro cloths. The South keep and exercise the power granted to them. They have now more than twenty Representatives on this floor on account of slaves. They have the power and benefit arising from the compromise, and have never paid the miserable allowance; I will not call it an equivalent of taxation for that power. The agreement was made, and we abide by the obligation without complaint. Will our Southern brethren insist upon examining and re-examining our constitution, and seek, by narrow construction, to restrict its true meaning and spirit, and call new conventions to limit its power? In such an event, we, too, shall have some notions and projects peculiar to a free people, zealous for the just and equal rights of freemen.

Mr. Chairman, it seems now admitted as the settled policy of this country, that our revenue shall be raised mainly, if not wholly, by duties or imposts on foreign merchandise.

The first great question that naturally arises, is, how shall these duties be imposed? On what principle? Shall they be ad valorem or specific? Shall they be uniform, and at the same per cent., or shall they be discriminating? Upon these subjects I cannot admit there is much room for controversy. Our means and wants render discriminating duties expedient and necessary. The laws and regulations of foreign nations, in relation to their commerce and trade, each favoring its own peculiar interest, render it expedient and necessary. Whether we would or not, self-love and self-preservation compel us to act upon the defensive, and to adopt laws and regulations corresponding with those of foreign nations. We must pursue such a course, if we duly regard and respect the true interest of our own country. That nation, as well as that individual, "who provides not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel."

Sir, suppose the United States should propose to allow Great Britain to introduce into this country their corn and breadstuffs, free of duty, provided they would allow us the same privilege—would they repeal their corn laws, and allow us to send our flour and corn, free of duty, into their market? We know they would not. Should Great Britain make us the same proposition in relation to our woollen and cotton manufactures, we could not accede to it, without ruin to those interests.

Again: Great Britain is a kingdom of minerals, and affords coal and salt in abundance from their mines, and on the very borders of the ocean, from whence it may be easily exported, at a small expense, to every country. Our coal, unfortunately, is in the interior of our country, and we have no salt but that which is made by evaporation of salt water. It is manufactured at very considerable expense, especially on the seaboard, where foreign salt comes most in competition with the domestic salt. Shall we go to Great Britain for our coal and salt? or shall we, by reasonable and proper duties, encourage and support our own productions, brought into successful operation by much enterprise, labor, and expense?

Sir, I am proud to say I represent an interest that has asked little, and received little, at the hands of the Government; and yet Great Britain dares not meet it on her own element upon equal terms. I refer to the whale fishery. Great Britain gives her ships bounties, and excludes our oil by high duties. Our citizens have neither received nor desired such favors. But the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, has informed us that the manufacturers of woollens are compensated for the reduction of duties on foreign cloths, in part, by the reduction of duties on oil. Yes, sir, I fear that by that very reduction our whale fishery, which has hitherto surpassed that of all other nations, may be destroyed. In saying this, I do not mean to charge the committee with wantonly destroying, or intentionally putting it to great hazard; but the subject has not been sufficiently examined, and is not understood. I will notice it more particularly by and by.

Mr. Chairman, what do gentlemen mean by free trade and ad valorem duties? Would they at once abandon every employment and every production which any other nation or any other country furnishes cheaper than our own? If that be their policy, and the present act go into effect, and three cents protection duty be taken from cotton, I have no doubt, in a few short years, the very cotton planters, who are now so loud and violent in their complaints against protection, will be quite as zealous and earnest, if less violent, supplicants for relief. Sir, the cotton plant is not a native of South Carolina; and whatever distress they now suffer, arises from their unfavorable competition with their more southern neighbors, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. The cotton plant is an exotic in this country. In more southern climes, as in Brazil, for instance, the plant lives and flourishes, and bears cotton abundantly for three years. Here it scarcely lives one, and is often injured by frost. Suppose the yankee notion of a cotton gin, which has given the South the means of wealth, and raised them to such proud pre-eminence, were introduced into Brazil, and other places equally favorable, with capital, what would be the consequence? I leave the cotton grower to judge. It is at least a maxim of self-preservation, that they who live in glass houses should not constantly pelt the houses of their neighbors with stones.

Mr. Chairman, it is easy to complain, and very difficult to give satisfaction to those who are habitually querulous. Such men will always insist, as soon as any law or regulation is made affecting the interest of the country, that others have the best of the bargain. So long ago as the year 1816, and before, we heard constant complaints from many Southern people and others, that the North had great advantages in the navigation laws; that the South were subject to heavy burdens in consequence; and that the North charged high and unreasonable freight. These complaints were believed to be entirely groundless, but arguments were useless. To put an end to these unfounded complaints, we put to hazard a most important interest. By the laws of 1816 and 1824, we placed our navigation upon terms of reciprocity with foreign nations. What has been the result? Freight has not been affected. Although on the statute book our navigation was protected by an extravagant duty, still it had no power to raise freight to an unreasonable price, because the severe competition among ourselves had reduced it to the very minimum. But this evil, so formidable in the eyes of many, once removed, another immediately takes its place.

Mr. Chairman, although no satisfactory reason can be given, in my opinion, in favor of the bill before us, and though it seems to have been prepared to quiet the unfounded, extravagant, and violent demands of South Carolina, still I rejoice that even this bill rejects the principles of equal ad valorem duties. It fully establishes the principles of protection and discriminating duties; principles which never can be abandoned by any civilized, independent nation.

Sir, I object to the bill, because it makes an unwise, unequal, and injudicious discrimination. It does not regard with fairness and equality the rights of all and every interest in our common country. I frankly admit the subject is complex and difficult. It requires a minute and candid examination, with a fixed purpose to do justice, and with a single eye to the good of the country, disregarding all political effect. The Committee of Ways and Means were very improper arbiters of the great interests of the Northern and Middle States; four out of the seven residing south of the Potomac. I never understood either one of the number felt any favor for the protective system. What could we expect more favorable from such a committee, than such a bill as they have given us? After the committee had ascertained, and reported how much, or rather how little revenue was required, and it had been clearly ascertained that there would be a surplus, they should have reported the fact to the House, and the subject should have been referred to a tariff committee. I do not mean nominally, but to a committee in deed and in truth friendly to the manufacturing as well as other interests of the country; to a committee friendly to the system of protection, that they might make reductions on such things, and to such extent, as should save and foster those interests. Justice, expediency, the happiness and prosperity of our common country, demand that the subject should be thoroughly investigated, and that we should possess all the light and knowledge which can be afforded by practical men. Have the committee, in the present case, so investigated it? We all know they have not. They have not had time or opportunity for the work. But, sir, we are informed the bill is open to amendments. If this committee think fit and proper to proceed with the measure, I trust amendments may be made; otherwise, wide-spread ruin must be the inevitable consequence.

Sir, if it were ascertained (as it is not) that our revenue required further reduction, I should despair at this time of making such a bill as the best interest of our country requires at our hands. We have not time for information.

The committee observe in their report:

"In adjusting the several duties, they have generally conformed, unless some strong reason for a different rate was perceived, to those of the tariff act of 1816, with its short supplementary act of 1818. The act of 1816 was framed with great care and deliberation by some of our ablest statesmen, looking at the same time to the revenue then so peculiarly necessary for the discharge of our large war debt, and to the preservation, during a violent transition from war to peace, of the numerous manufactures that had grown up under the double duties, and the practical prohibition of the embargo, the non-intercourse, and the war with Great Britain."

Mr. Chairman, the committee are entirely mistaken. This bill does not conform to the principles laid down in the report. It is far otherwise. Why reduce the duty to twenty per cent. on coarse cottons? But we are told, and told truly, that they are made as cheap, or nearly as cheap, in this as in any other country, and of as good quality; and that they are occasionally exported. Why, then, put so successful, and profitable, and useful manufactures at hazard?—alike useful to cotton grower, cotton manufacturer, and consumer of the fabric. Why put them to the hazard and risk of foreign competition? a competition beneficial to none, if successful; and, if the factories fail and break down under the pressure, injurious to all. I repeat, why try the experiment? Every body admits that coarse cottons manufactured here are abundant enough, good enough, and cheap enough; why not let well enough alone? Sir, is this experiment worse than useless, conformably to the tariff law of 1816? Far otherwise.

Sir, on a careful comparison, gentlemen will find the present bill differs essentially from the act of 1816. I have a statement before me pointing out the difference; but I forbear to trespass so far upon the time of the House, and pass it over. But coal and iron (those favored articles) have the benefit of the tariff of 1816: more, the special tariff of 1818 is specially introduced to sanction additional duty on iron. The duty on iron and coal falls entirely on the seaboard, and a portion of country contiguous; it does not in the least affect that portion of the country far from the ocean, unless it raise the price of their iron and coal. The expense of transportation secures them against foreign competition, and secures to them at least their own market. Those who reside on the seaboard can import these articles from Europe at a much less expense than the same articles can be transported from the interior of our own country. The duties on those articles are a very heavy tax upon our navigation, manufactures, and agriculture. We have little iron ore on the seaboard, and we now import iron to a very great amount, notwithstanding the duty.

The committee remark in their report, that, "in the bill herewith reported by them, they have endeavored to arrange the duties, with reference to this principle, at rates of from ten to twenty per cent., varying from them chiefly in those instances where national independence, in time of war, seemed to demand some sacrifice in peace, as in the case of iron."

I believe, Mr. Chairman, it has always been admitted as a correct principle in our legislation, that we should afford protection to those things necessary in time of war. I would say, sir, in a word, necessities in war and peace, and therefore necessary to our independence. By what facts, or experience, or logic, the committee have arrived at the conclusion that "independence in time of war seemed to demand some sacrifice in peace, as in the case of iron," and iron alone, I am at a loss to determine. In the memorable July, 1776, a committee of thirteen, one from each of the States, was appointed to make inquiry for virgin lead, leaden ore, and the best method of collecting, smelting, and refining it; and on the same day the same committee were directed, in the recess of Congress, to inquire into the easiest and cheapest method of making salt in these colonies.

December 29, 1776. It was resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to the several assemblies, or conventions, immediately to promote, by sufficient public encouragement, the making salt in their respective colonies.

June 3, 1777. Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to devise ways and means for supplying the United States with salt, &c. &c.

How does it happen, sir, that these resolutions stand forth in such bold relief on the journals of the old Congress? Think you they knew what was necessary in time of war? Did they not find lead and salt quite as necessary, and more difficult to be procured than iron? Why, then, admit iron alone as a necessary in time of war? Why, in fixing the duty on lead and salt, have no regard to the principle laid down as to iron? Why, as to those articles, have no regard to the basis and foundation (as stated in the report) of the present bill, the tariff of 1816?

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GILMORE,] one of our two friends of protection, on the committee, insists upon it that iron is protected by the present bill, and with that he seems to be satisfied. Suppose iron and coal are protected, are there no other important interests in Pennsylvania and the other States? If the provisions of the bill are partial and unequal, they are unjust. Our tariff must be a fair and equal system, without laying unreasonable burdens, or conferring special benefits. Should a bill pass this House, and become a law, by accident, or combination, manifestly unjust, protecting some interests, and abandoning others, it would not meet the approbation of the people. Those interests abandoned would hereafter claim protection, and their claims would be allowed. They would claim equalization, and justice would be awarded, by levelling up or levelling down the duties.

Mr. Chairman, according to the usage of this House, the whole bill is fairly before us for examination. I will now, for a few minutes, notice the proposed amendment which will first be decided. I allude to the proposition to strike out so much of the bill as proposes a new tax on tea and coffee.

Sir, tea and coffee are of universal use, and essential to the comfort and happiness of the people of the United States. With a full knowledge of this fact, and a strong disposition most effectually to relieve all, without injuring any, no longer ago than July last, Congress (yes, we ourselves, two-thirds of us voting for it) repealed this very duty on tea and coffee. We relieved the people of this burden; and the law repealing the duty on coffee is to take effect in March next, and on tea at a more distant period.

But, sir, the committee inform us in their report, that "to this annual amount, however, of fifteen millions, the revenue must be reduced. All beyond this must be a needless burden upon the people." In accordance with their report, the committee have proceeded to reduce duties, in my opinion, without duly regarding the interests of the country; and then propose to assess this tax on tea and coffee. Revenue superabundant, all beyond a needless burden upon the people! Why, then, afflict them with this oppressive and uncalled for tax? For if not wanted, it is oppressive.

There are many reasons, sir, why this tax should not be laid. I will briefly state some of them.

As I have already hinted, it is a tax upon an article of universal consumption. Tea and coffee cannot be produced in our country, and therefore, if necessary to our happiness in peace or war, we can have no motive to even attempt to produce them. These articles are not only of universal consumption, but their use will be increased. The great and glorious temperance reformation, which God grant may continue until it has had its perfect work, will greatly increase the use of tea and coffee as a substitute for ardent spirits. I rejoice at the refusal of the tax in July, on that account among other reasons. I hope we may not, by our legislation, in the smallest degree, check a reformation essential to national honor, character, and salvation. I confess, the reduction of duties on spirits, and the imposition of duties on tea and coffee, look as if, in our desire to effect some political object, we had overlooked the great moral effect upon our country.

Sir, coffee and tea do not come in competition with any production of our country; and no articles can be found so valuable to our commerce and navigation. They are of great value; may be safely kept for a long time; and coffee improves by age. Every thing conspires to render the extensive importation of these articles a source of greater profit and benefit to the country.

The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. IVERSON,] in his able argument, informed us that coffee, in particular, was purchased in exchange for our own productions; and though I do not certainly know the fact, I will hazard the opinion, that tea is often purchased with the cotton of the South, by drawing bills on London. Another important fact is worthy of consideration: we import tea and coffee not only for ourselves, but for other nations. By the talent and enterprise of our merchants, our country is made the great depository of the articles in question.

1831, of coffee,	79,010,212 lbs.
It was estimated that we used in 1830,	38,500,000 lbs.
Leaving at least, for exportation,	40,000,000 lbs.
We imported during same year, teas of all kinds,	5,459,293 lbs.

By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the duties paid on those articles in the above year were, $3,291,759 49

I am aware that that sum will be somewhat reduced by drawback. I presume the importation has been still greater the year past. Does the law of July, repealing those da-

* Since this speech was delivered, I have met with the following information:

"A letter from Copenhagen states that, since the formation of temperance societies in Sweden, the importation of coffee into Stockholm has been increased, between the months of January and August last, by a million and a half of pounds."

The Tariff Bill.

ties, and others, offer no relief to the people? The people know better. By that tariff they were relieved of six millions of duties. The duty now proposed to be again laid on the same articles, not only imposes unnecessary burdens upon the people, of the most offensive character, but goes far to destroy the foreign trade, so useful and beneficial to the country. These articles, so important and necessary to the happiness of the people, of so great amount and value, are, and always must be, of foreign growth. It is, then, the part of wisdom and true political economy, to secure and provide at all times, within the country, an abundant supply. How is this to be effected? Allow tea and coffee to be free articles, unembarrassed by any custom-house exactions. Allow our merchants freely to compete with foreign merchants. Then, indeed, will our country be the great depository for tea and coffee; not only affording an abundant supply for ourselves, but large quantities for exportation to foreign countries. This supply in the country will always secure us against all monopolies, and from all scarcities in the market, and ensure the articles at a reasonable price.

But, sir, we may be told all this foreign trade may be equally encouraged by a drawback, or by warehouses where these articles may be placed. The fact is not so. Bonds and warehouses are very useful, and may and do offer all the facilities in the power of Government, provided a duty be laid. But every body must know they are very serious incumbrances; incumbrances that should not be allowed to exist in the present case, if we sincerely desire to promote successful competition with foreign nations. There must be limitations, as to time, in drawbacks. If we import tea and coffee for European markets, the competition with Europeans must be a severe struggle. It profits us much every way, and we are bound to consult the interests of the nation, and do nothing unnecessarily to hinder or impede such commerce, but all in our power to encourage it. Sir, the amount of duty now proposed to be laid on tea and coffee, according to the last amendment, if adopted, will be more than a million of dollars. I have no doubt, should this new tax go into effect, that, by the clogs and discouragement it would impose upon the importation, and the expense and premium it would unavoidably add, the price would be enhanced to double the amount of the tax to the consumers. Why burden the people at this time by an unnecessary tax of two millions? Why resort to new taxes? when our ostensible object is reduction, when we are so often reminded that our revenue is more than is wanted, and that the excess must be reduced by the present Congress, at the present time. Sir, when the Parliament of Great Britain imposed a tax on our tea, when we were unrepresented, and, without our consent, our worthy and patriotic mothers renounced its use, and our fathers threw it overboard. But when we formed a Government of our own, and were represented, all, all have cheerfully submitted to heavy taxation upon tea and coffee, and many millions of dollars of revenue have been raised by these duties. Last July we ascertained that the tax was no longer needed, and we gladly repealed it. Let us not be found retracing such steps of wise, useful, and beneficent legislation. I will not believe, until I hear the ayes and noes, that we shall again assess this tax upon the people. The committee inform us that "we are out of debt, have an overflowing treasury; that the excess and surplus must be reduced; that the people must be relieved of their burdens;" and yet, strange as it may appear, they propose a new tax on tea. I will read a short extract from their report:

"They also propose to fix a moderate specific duty, equal to about twenty per cent. on the value upon teas, which were made wholly free by the act of the last summer. This has been added from a motive of financial prudence, lest the revenue from the customs should, from any modification of the bill, or other cause, fall short of the estimate, or lest the proceeds of the public lands should be in part diverted to some other source; in either of which cases an increased revenue would be derived from this source, of about 700,000 dollars, calculated on the rather short importation of tea in the last year."

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means remarked in his speech, that he should "now come to another class of objections. These are in regard to the amount of revenue to be derived from this bill. It is indeed difficult to reply to all these. They remind me of the story told of (I think) Dean Swift, who once asked an acquaintance, 'Did you ever find any good weather in the course of your life?' The other replied, 'Yes, thank Heaven! a great deal.' 'Now,' said the cynical wit, 'I never did: I have always found it too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry.' Our poor bill has met with even harder censures than that of Swift upon the weather. It is not only too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, too high or too low, alternately, but all of them at the same time."

Again: "These duties have been added, as I before suggested, as a precaution against any deficiency of the revenue from the withdrawal of the proceeds of the lands, or any other cause whatever. I will also add, for the satisfaction of one of my Connecticut friends, [Mr. ELLSWORTH,] who questioned me on that point, that they were added on the protective principle. They were put in to secure sufficient revenue in any case."

Sir, if the honorable chairman will allow me, I will show the application of his own story to his own case. His report and bill begin by asserting and assuming that the tariff must be repealed, because we have more revenue than is wanted, and we are bound to relieve the people of burdens; and the bill ends by burdening the people with a new tax on silks, tea, and coffee, as a precautionary measure. The beginning and end of this short bill come as near blowing hot and cold in the same breath as any thing I ever met with; and if it pass and become a law, "our good weather" will indeed be clouded and overcast with gloomy prospects.

But these new duties are "precautionary" and "protective." If sufficient caution has been used to ascertain that we have a surplus revenue, why assess new taxes by way of precaution? If the amount of revenue be so uncertain, why repeal the tariff?

Sir, the report of the committee is before us, and was not drawn by unlearned or unskilful hands. It is no more than fair to presume it makes the best of the case. It is intended as the foundation and argument to sustain and support this bill. It speaks a language to my mind not to be mistaken. The fair inference from the whole report is, that the committee are not and cannot be sufficiently informed as to the amount of revenue which will be required the ensuing year. They are not and cannot be sufficiently informed as to what will be the effect and what the amount of duties under the tariff of July, 1832. They acknowledge their lack of information, information to be obtained alone from experience. They acknowledge it by the doubtful and indefinite manner in which they make their specifications; they acknowledge it not in words only, but by their deeds; by their allowance for "lee way;" by their seizure upon silks, and tea, and coffee, as sureties, as the chairman says, upon "protective principles," to protect them, I suppose, from their own errors. Sir, in making estimates with a pencil in one's hand, it is very easy to add or subtract a figure which may increase or diminish the revenue thousands or millions. This may be done honestly, according to one's hopes, or fears, or theory of political economy. I, too, have made estimates; but, as I have spoken lightly of others, I will not offer my own. This House cannot pretend to have better information than the committee; then, most assuredly, we are not prepared to act upon this important subject, involving the interest and happiness of millions.

Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] favored us last evening with his speech upon the bill. He commenced by deprecating a discussion upon its general principles as a mere waste of time. He conjured the House to act promptly, (in two or three days, I believe,) and considers the subject familiar to the whole country. Does the gentleman refer to the subject of a tariff? a system of duties generally? or does he refer to the report of the committee and the bill we are considering? If to the latter, I assure the gentleman the subject is not familiar to the country, or even to this House. It needs much examination. But the gentleman says, proceed, and make amendments. Where shall we begin? How much shall the present revenue be diminished? Will the bill before us reduce the revenue? What will be the general as well as particular effects of the measure upon the prosperity of the country—upon its labor and capital? Does it become us, who have spent so many months in forming a tariff, now so rashly and rudely to attempt to defeat its operation? I rejoice that the gentleman assures us, and I question not his sincerity, that the bill affords sufficient protection to manufactures, and, as I understood, to all other important interests in the country. I do not rejoice because I think the gentleman and the committee have, by the bill, effectuated their object. Far from it. But I rejoice to learn it was their intention so to do. I had feared that they, in the discharge of what they considered a strange work, a painful duty, found it necessary to abandon to utter ruin many important interests and manufactures. I repeat, sir, it gives me pleasure that we have the hope and prospect, when we proceed to the details and amendments, that the committee will, if convinced that the bill may prove ruinous to any branch of manufactures, or any important interest, consent and aid in its amendment.

I beg leave, sir, to express my approbation of another rule for our action, which has been laid down with much emphasis by that gentleman—a rule which I understand will govern him and other gentlemen of the Committee of Ways and Means. I refer to the statistical evidence. Indeed, if we will not obtain information from those who alone possess it, we shall seek it elsewhere in vain. The gentleman has not only laid down the rule in theory, but carried it into practice, and read many passages to prove, from the testimony of the manufacturers themselves, that the bill before us will not injure them. This statistical evidence, read partly from a volume just published by order of this House, and collected by the Secretary of the Treasury from the manufacturers, the gentleman says, should govern and control our decisions. I concur, in the main, in his views upon this subject. The evidence is certainly entitled to much consideration. The gentleman has read the statements of several manufacturers, who speak of twenty or thirty per cent. profits—most extravagant profits. He particularly notices the report of a Mr. Shepherd, of Northampton, Massachusetts. I have heard he has since failed in business. I should always expect such men would fail; because, in reality, no such extravagant profits, for any length of time, can be made. Those men who make such erroneous and extravagant calculations, consult their imaginations and hopes more than arithmetic, their day-book, and ledger. If we would derive useful information from the book, we must not be governed by a few isolated cases, especially if they are contradicted by the weight of evidence.

If manufacturing were, indeed, so profitable, would not more capitalists engage in it? We have, in the North, no opportunity to speculate in boundless forests of the best of land. Sir, there is no lack of disposition to adventure and speculation, but our surplus capital is employed and let at a very moderate rate of interest, for the plain reason that our situation and business afford no opportunity for great gains.

But one of many volumes, a small part, has been published, giving the returns of the manufactures of Maine and Massachusetts. The remainder is still in manuscript. The gentleman has read but few returns, and those only upon the subject of the cotton and woollen manufactures. Sir, I thank him for introducing the book, and invite his attention, and the attention of the House, for a few minutes, while I examine the returns in regard to some other manufactures. The gentleman informs us particularly that the woollen manufacturers can get on well; because, among other things, they are relieved from the tax on indigo, dyestuffs, and olive oil. The chairman of the committee, in his speech, also alluded to the reduction of the duty on olive oil.

Mr. Chairman: Olive oil is used in the manufacture of woollens, and is a substitute for spermaceti oil. Both bear very nearly the same price in the market, and they rise and fall together. By the law of 1816, which we were informed was the basis of this bill, the duty on olive oil was twenty-five cents a gallon. The same duty was continued until July last, when it was reduced to twenty cents. I have been quite as desirous as the committee can be, to have this and other duties reduced as low as possible, consistent with safety, and the true interests of the country. I trust the whale fishery will be protected; that while these daring fishermen are lawfully pursuing their hazardous enterprises, even to the other side of the globe, they may look back upon their beloved country with an eye of faith and assurance, that they cannot go beyond the reach and regard of its protection.

I now invite the gentleman, and the committee, to turn to page 97, Document 3, No. 14, in the same book from which he read last evening. I invite him and them to examine the report. I do not feel at liberty to read more than two or three short extracts: "Answers of Hon. Barker Burnell, of Nantucket, to question 25.—Olive and other imported oils come in competition with oil and candles; and, should the duty on olive oil be repealed, it would most seriously affect their production." "To question 34.—The specific duty of 25 cents per gallon does not prevent large importations of olive oil." The same facts are stated in page 203.

In the memorial of the citizens of New Bedford, which was presented to this House in February, 1832, and printed, it is said, "The proposed repeal of the duty on olive oil presents, in our view, a question of great importance. To expose the large products of our spermaceti fishery, without any protection, to a competition in our own markets with foreign oil, would, in our opinion, not only endanger an extensive and very important branch of our national enterprise and industry, but endanger it, for the purpose of extending to other branches of that enterprise an incidental and limited benefit."

I also refer, sir, to the memorial of the inhabitants of Nantucket, which is printed, and in our books, and presents a very able statement of the whale fishery, and the reasons why this duty, as a matter of justice and policy, ought not to be repealed. It is proposed to reduce the duty to aid the manufacturers. I have shown clearly, by the book, the statistics, and by the memorial, that, at a duty of 25 cents per gallon, a considerable quantity of olive oil has been imported, to the exclusion of our own oil. In the year ending December, 1831, there were imported 231,608 gallons of olive oil, on which a duty was paid of $57,902. The duty on olive oil was fixed at 25 cents per gallon, by the law of 1816. By the tariff of July last, it was reduced to 20 cents per gallon. The present price of olive oil is about one dollar and ten cents per-gallon, and, by the present bill, it is proposed to reduce the duty to 10 cents per gallon; about eleven per cent. upon its present value.

The whale fishery is, in some measure, local; though at present it is rapidly extending in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York. I cannot believe its value and importance is understood. If it were understood, surely it would not be hazarded for a few thousand dollars. I trust this committee will allow me, in a very few words, to state the amount and value of this fishery.

There are now engaged in it more than three hundred ships of best quality, their tonnage exceeding one hundred thousand tons; seamen employed, seven thousand; value of the ships and outfits, seven millions of dollars; yearly income, probably five millions of dollars. Very considerable manufactures are connected with, and result from, the fishery, which I have not time to specify. The annual expenditure for casks, provisions, &c., exclusive of labor, in fitting out the ships, may be estimated at not less than one million eight hundred and eighty-one thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven dollars. This fishery was well nigh destroyed by the late war. It has received no extraordinary encouragement from our Government; but it has been protected abroad; and, in 1816, by the tariff then made, it received protection by a duty of 25 cents per gallon on the importation of olive oil. Sir, I think, from the statement of facts I have given, every body must be satisfied with its present prosperity and success. We have no market for our spermaceti oil but in our own country. Great Britain excludes it, and other nations do not use it. We have an abundance, and shall soon have a surplus. Shall these fishermen have the benefit of our own market? or shall this valuable and important interest be hazarded and jeopardized for the sake of reducing the duty, for a short time, on olive oil? I have, sir, in my hand, a book, which I esteem valuable; it is Document 99: An authentic statement of the fisheries, and laws in relation to those of England, France, and the Netherlands, communicated to this House, last year, by the President. I am not about further to fatigue the committee, by reading from this book. But when we are adopting a policy deeply affecting a most important national interest, a navigating interest, an interest all-important to national defence, to our navy, would it not be well, for a moment, to examine the policy of those nations? I will begin with Great Britain. She gives liberal bounties, and excludes our oil by a duty of forty-five cents per gallon. France gives a most liberal bounty of eighty francs per ton, if manned (as our ships are) with native seamen, and less, if partially manned with native seamen. The like bounty to our whale ships would amount, I believe, to no less than $1,500,000. Poor Holland, in the hope and desire, if possible, of renovating her former maritime spirit and enterprise, is not less liberal in her bounties. Our fishery, by the force of superior talent, courage, enterprise, and skill, has succeeded without bounties. Sir, it asks none—it needs none. Obtain for our fishery the market of England, (the only market for spermaceti oil,) and those interested will gladly relinquish, not only ten cents duty, but all duty on the importation of foreign oil. But Great Britain, mistress of the ocean, dares not consent to such a treaty of reciprocity. She dares not hazard her whale fishery on terms of fair and equal competition with ours. Is our astonishing and unparalleled success in this most hazardous and adventurous employment matter of no national pride and exultation? Do we not learn by this success the true cause of our naval triumphs? I detract nothing from the high merit of the officers of our navy; justice will always award to them their share of the glory of victory. The maritime Powers of Europe have been taught the value of seamen like ours, and their high bounties show their policy and desire to obtain them. We have them without cost, and their value cannot be estimated; and yet we are gravely deliberating whether, to save for a short period a few cents per gallon on olive oil, we will put to hazard the whole interest, and drive our protectors from the ocean. The manufacturers of woolsens do not desire it; they ask that their own interest may be protected, but surely they will neither ask for, nor consent to, the destruction of others. At a proper time I shall submit a motion to strike out so much of the bill as fixes a duty of ten cents per gallon on olive oil. If it prevail, and the section be stricken out, as I trust it will, the duty will then be as at present, under the law of July last, twenty cents per gallon.

Sir, I now ask the attention of the committee for a moment to the statistics in reference to flint glass. In page 308, I refer to the statement of the glass manufactories of Sandwich, in my own district. They use, yearly, lead of Missouri and Illinois, 338,000 lbs.; pearlash of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, and Massachusetts, 228,000 lbs.; sand of New Jersey, 416 tons; coal of Virginia, 700 tons; corn of Maryland, 10,000 bushels; flour of New York and Maryland, 1,000 barrels; hard coal of Pennsylvania, 150 tons.

Sir, the art of manufacturing glass in this country is perfect, and the materials, especially the lead, better than any imported. Our flint glass, whether plain, pressed, or cut, is manifestly superior to European glass. We have actually made some important improvements in the manufacture of pressed glass. A few years since one cargo was sent to England, the duties paid, and the glass sold; but, without delay, the English manufacturers sent skilful men here, and obtained our art. Our lead, and coal, and labor, cost something more than in Great Britain. Will you take this lead and coal, &c. and manufacture them into glass, or abandon your mines, and go at once to England? The materials are collected from widely distant parts of our country, and from nine different States; but they are carried in vessels at a small expense. This manufacture brings into use lead, coal, &c., which would otherwise be useless. Cannot those who possess the coal, and lead, and pearlash, and sand, and corn, and flour, exchange them for glass, easier, and on more favorable terms, than to pay the cash for English glass?

Sir, I am pleased with these statistics, for another reason. This little story of the Sandwich glass manufacture is worthy of notice. The materials and food are furnished by nine different States of this Union; and each might well be pleased with the beautiful glass it has contributed to make, and all may rejoice in their mutual abundance and mutual dependence. The present bill, without amendment, would prostrate the manufacture of glass throughout the country—an example of which I have given. I will add to these remarks hereafter, if necessary, when the proposition may be made to amend the bill as to the duty on glass.

Sir, I beg your attention, and that of the committee, to page 91 of the document before us. You have there a very full and perfect account of the manufacture of salt in the county of Barnstable, Massachusetts, by Messrs. Crocker & Otis. They state that there are in the county of Barnstable 1,414,608 feet of salt works; capital invested, $1,414,608; lumber from Maine, of which the manufactories were built, cost $707,304; salt manufactured annually, 397,032 bushels, of 75 lbs. each, of the best quality, manufactured by solar evaporation, like Turk's island salt. These manufactories are not large, but are owned by eight hundred and eighty-one different individuals. The income is less than six per cent. on the capital, as appears by the report. These numerous owners, together with others who manufacture salt in the country, carry their salt to market, and there meet the foreign salt; and the competition has materially reduced the price, and ensured to the country at all times a sufficiency of this necessary of life. The duty has already been reduced the last year from twenty cents to fifteen, and now to ten cents per bushel. Why reduce it further? Why prostrate and destroy the manufactories? With what anxiety did this country once look to the important discovery of manufacturing salt? In the course of fifty years it has been brought to great perfection; but ships returning from Liverpool can bring salt in ballast from the mines a few cents a bushel cheaper than it can be manufactured here. These importations are precarious, and the price will be, as it has been, uncertain. Destroy the manufactories, rely upon importations alone, and, my word for it, the price of salt would be raised and fluctuating, and, in case of interruption of our commerce, trebled.

The salt manufactories in the interior, as well as on the seaboard, in this country, have cost not less than seven millions of dollars; and we now manufacture between four and five millions of bushels of salt yearly, on the seaboard and in the interior. The tax is not an unequal one, nor can any part of the country complain that it pays more than its proportion. I subjoin a table showing the quantity imported into each of our ports in the year 1831.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

T. L. SMITH, Register.

I forbear, sir, to read more from the book before me. I leave the task to others more competent to correct the errors of the gentleman from Tennessee and the committee, in relation to the all-important interests of the cotton and woollen manufactures. I will notice some other amendments at a future period.

But, sir, it seems this testimony, this statistical evidence, the evidence so all-important upon which this bill hangs, has been printed only in part, and a small part, too, and not yet laid on our tables. But the gentleman from Tennessee informs us he has examined the statistics, and he has volumes of manuscript before him; volumes which have not been examined by the members of this House. Shall we act upon faith? or rather, shall we not have the documents printed, that each member of Congress may read for himself, and understand for himself? But they cannot be printed in season for use during the present Congress. If I am called upon to give a verdict upon the bill, let me first hear the evidence as well as argument. Show me the statistical evidence which the gentleman admits to be so all-important, which governs him, and which will, in a great measure, govern me. The evidence is complicated, and may, in some cases, be contradictory; let us examine and cross-examine it for ourselves, and then deliberate and decide.

Mr. Chairman, if we are resolved to reduce the revenue at this time, we ought to avail ourselves of our own tariff of 1832. We know that that act was adapted to the present condition of the country, and passed with great deliberation. Let then that tariff be established as the basis, and let such a per centage be deducted from it as may be judged expedient.

But, sir, the committee say the revenue should be reduced by the present Congress, at the present time, because, say they, "the extinguishment of the debt, and the commencement of the new Presidential term, make this a fit season for permanent fiscal regulations." Are these reasons sufficient and satisfactory? Will they justify us in repealing our own acts passed so lately, so deliberately, and by so great a majority? Does it become us to speak of permanent fiscal regulations when we are not content to wait one year to learn the practical effect of our own tariff? I know it would be rather an interesting fact to record on the page of history, that, on the commencement of the second term of the Presidency of General Jackson, we adopted permanent fiscal regulations; but let us remember the same history must record our vacillating conduct, and the many and great evils the people have suffered from the innovations we have made in our own laws—the short-lived permanency of our tariff.

I have, Mr. Chairman, endeavored to examine the report and bill with care. I trust I have shown to this committee, conclusively, that the reasons and argument of the report do not support the result, the bill. The cause is inadequate to the effect. I take it to be a correct principle in political as well as natural and moral philosophy, that every effect must have been produced by a sufficient and adequate cause. I am compelled to seek for the cause of the bill we are considering elsewhere than in the report. I do not learn it from the public speeches, but I do learn it from private conversation, frequently a much more sure test of real opinion, and the true cause of action in this House. On my arrival here, at the commencement of the present session, and ever since, the question has been asked again and again, and by a number of members of this House, "Are you willing to make a new tariff?" When the objections and evils are suggested, these gentlemen immediately answer by asking another question: "Would you not rather repeal the tariff than suffer the evils of nullification, secession, and civil war?" I answer, in the first place, I do not believe these calamities will happen; and, secondly, even if there be danger, we have no right to do evil and injustice to our constituents and the country, that good may come. Let us do our duty, and leave the consequences. God alone can overrule evil for good.

Mr. Chairman: I cannot boast that I have more firmness than other gentlemen in this House, and I will not admit I have less sympathy for the sufferings and misfortunes of any portion of my fellow-citizens; but, sir, I cannot allow my understanding to be controlled by the unjust and unconstitutional demands of nullification. To be controlled by such threats, and influenced by such apprehensions, would indeed be taking counsel of fear.

I admire the eloquent dissertation the honorable chairman gave us yesterday upon fear. He observed: "There are, however, other fears of a different sort. There may be fear of taxing the citizen to enrich the treasury; and fear of weakening the bonds of union, the strongest bonds of union, the bonds of willing hearts, the feelings of loyal attachment to this Government, by unnecessary taxation; fears for the public peace; fears, not of any present danger, but for the permanent stability of our constitution. For such fears in myself, or in my friends, I cannot blush."

JAN. 22, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

But the honorable chairman assumes the whole question in controversy. He assumes that we have a superabundance of revenue; that it must now be reduced; that we must hasten to repeal the tariff; finally, that the bill he has introduced, and which we are considering, is wise, just, and expedient; and, above all things, that we ought to establish permanent fiscal regulations, to commence with the present Presidential term. With these assumptions of justice and expediency, the gentleman's honorable, patriotic, and praiseworthy fear is intended to goad and push us forward in the discharge of our duty.

But, sir, as often as I am called upon to act, I call for the reason for action. No satisfactory answer has yet been given to my call. I find it not in reports; I hear it not in speeches; but I think I distinctly perceive its influence and operation through those honorable and praiseworthy fears for which gentlemen cannot blush. I deprecate the advice of such counsellors upon cold calculations of dollars and cents in a tariff bill. Under the influence of such feelings (without suspecting it) we may abandon the dearest interests of our beloved country, and inflict a deep and lasting wound upon her faith, and honor, and prosperity.

South Carolina demands, positively, that this nation abandon discriminating duties and the protective policy. The committee have not yielded to that demand in their report or bill, but have honorably and firmly maintained the system. But, sir, my apprehension is, that, while the principle is sustained by the bill, it will be so unjust in its operation as to sacrifice millions of property, and the comfort and happiness of thousands and tens of thousands of honest, worthy, industrious fellow-citizens, who by the "sweat of the brow earn their daily bread."

Sir, the bill falls entirely short of the demands of South Carolina, which have been stated with precision and exactness. We cannot satisfy South Carolina. Her unreasonable claims must be rejected. Nullification and secession are but new words for revolution and rebellion. We cannot pass the bill under consideration, because it yields important national interests. But suppose gentlemen differ from me in this opinion; can they suppose the high-minded, chivalrous citizens of that State will be satisfied with a law that does not yield to them one tittle of the principle for which they so zealously contend? The controversy between South Carolina and the United States has assumed such a definite form that it must come to an issue. It is vain and useless to deceive ourselves by false hope of relief through the means of miserable expedients. The principles of South Carolina must be overcome and put down, or the Government of the United States is virtually at an end. There is no middle ground; it is Government or no Government, constitution or no constitution. Of course, I mean to be understood with limitations and restrictions. Our Government and constitution must be sustained, or our liberty is gone forever.

Sir, much has been done already to relieve the people of the burdens of taxation. The tariff of last session reduced the duties more than six millions of dollars. Our public debt is paid; we are at peace with all the world; our prosperity is unequalled, and yet we are restless and unsatisfied. The complaints of some portions of the country are loud, and violent, and threatening; their opposition is organized, their claims are specific. Shall we yield to their demands? Surely we cannot. To do so would be an abandonment of our constitution and Government. We might, indeed, retain a little longer its name and form, but, divested of its spirit and essence, who would value a name that had lost its import and signification? Our constitution and free Government were purchased by the treasure, sufferings, and blood of our fathers, and by their testament have been bequeathed to us. I value it highly for what it cost; I love and value it still higher for its intrinsic excellence. "My love casteth out fear."

It must put down nullification, secession, and rebellion; it must put down faction and revolution, under every guise, and name, and form they may assume; or it must fail to protect and bless the people, and cease to command their reverence and obedience. The path of duty is plain, though sometimes painful. Under the constitution, the Government of the people of the United States is now entrusted to our care: God forbid that, from any cause, we should be led to betray that trust.

If the bill I have spoken so much of, be intended as a peace-offering, I would answer, I have no authority to yield the rights and interests of my constituents; besides, we have the sine qua non of South Carolina, and know the sacrifice cannot be made.

Mr. Chairman: Under a free Government there will be honest differences of opinion, and love of power will manifest itself in every form. Those to whom the destiny of this great and flourishing republic may be confided, must not be deceived by art and design, nor overawed by violence and passion.

I have detained the committee too long. I am aware my remarks have been desultory, but I desired to speak of the policy, generally, from 1816, which required me to speak of many things, old and new.

In my judgment we ought to postpone this bill. We have yet to learn the practical operation of the last tariff. Let us submit to be taught by experience, the only perfect instructor. If the best interests of our country shall require further changes, let them be made. May those upon whom may be devolved the responsibility of making amendments, act candidly, honestly, and deliberately, unawed by fear, and uninfluenced by ambition or the ambitious. May our fiscal regulations be founded upon equal justice and sound policy, and may the people see the foundation upon which they stand; and God grant they may be permanent.

Mr. APPLETON, of Massachusetts, next rose, and addressed the committee as follows: I have no doubt, said he, that this committee will give me full credit for sincerity when I assure them that it is with extreme reluctance that I rise to address them on this occasion. Certainly, nothing in itself can be more appalling than the idea of making a speech upon the tariff; which, of necessity, must be expected to be far more tedious than any merely thrice told tale. But the great amount of capital belonging to my constituents, involved in the decision of this question an amount far greater, I apprehend, than is represented by any other individual on this floor, imposes on me a duty which I dare not avoid. Nor is this all. The principles embodied in the bill on your table, and the circumstances under which it is brought forward, give to this measure an importance, a solemnity, which have attached to few questions which have been agitated, since the establishment of the Government. It is, in my estimation, intimately connected with the permanent peace, happiness, and prosperity, if not with the very existence of this Union.

Now, sir, what are the circumstances under which this measure is brought forward? Notwithstanding the greater part of the last, long protracted session was occupied on this subject; notwithstanding the result of those labors was the passage of a bill, by the votes of a majority of this House almost unprecedented in any important measure—a bill which was received throughout the whole country with all but universal satisfaction, as a fair compromise, as the harbinger of peace, of reduced excitement; notwithstanding all this, we are now informed, by authority, that we must review our work; that that bill will not do; that the whole matter must be gone over again.

The Tariff Bill.

The measure before us naturally presents two questions: the first, whether it is necessary, proper, or expedient, that we should pass any bill on this subject; the second, whether, on the supposition that that question is answered in the affirmative, this is such a bill as we ought to pass.

Notwithstanding the impatience of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] that we should come to the details of the bill, I must first discuss the preliminary and previous question—are there any good reasons why we should pass any bill at all?

Why, Mr. Chairman, should we disturb the act of last July? Nobody dreamed of doing so before the meeting of Congress. All the reasons are to be found in the communications to this body from the Executive. Let us examine them. The duty is urged upon us of reducing the revenue to the expenditures of the Government; and the first question is, what relation do they now bear to each other?

The President informs us, in his annual message, that "It is expected, however, that, in consequence of the reduced rates of duty, which will take effect after the 3d of March next, there will be a considerable falling off in the revenue from customs in the year 1833. It will, nevertheless, be amply sufficient to provide for all the wants of the public service, estimated even upon a liberal scale, and for the redemption and purchase of the remainder of the public debt."

Well, sir, then for 1833 there is no difficulty. Notwithstanding the reduction in the term of credit for duties after the 3d of March, and the circumstance that a considerable portion of them will be payable in cash, thus concentrating a great part of the revenue of two years, the revenue is only expected to be amply sufficient for the expenditure, including the reimbursement of the balance of the public debt, so that for a year to come, at least, there can be no surplus.

We are next told that "the final removal of this great burden [the public debt] from our resources affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defence which the constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for them."

Here is a sentiment to which the whole nation will respond; the happy era of freedom from debt, presents an admirable opportunity for doing something liberal and glorious for the general welfare.

But, sir, without making any calculation for these proposed objects, of which the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report for the last year, furnished us a long list, have we arrived at a point where we can decide with any degree of certainty or confidence that the revenue, under the bill of last session, will exceed the proper and necessary expenditure of the Government? That bill was framed for the express purpose, and with the express view, to reduce the revenue to the amount of the expenditure, and, at the same time, to preserve that incidental protection to manufactures which has always formed a part of our revenue system.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs us, in his last annual report, that he still believes that fifteen millions (as estimated in the report of 1831) is a fair estimate of the probable expenses of the Government, for all objects other than the public debt. I shall assume it to be so; and propose to inquire what reason there is to believe the revenue under the act of July last will exceed that sum.

In doing so, I put out of the question the sales of the public lands, as not furnishing any permanent fund for the expenditure of the Government. It is well known that a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of these sales amongst the several States, passed the other branch of the Legislature during the last session, and was postponed in this House, at the close of the session, by a small majority, on the ground that the time was too short for acting upon so important a matter. There are various other projects for the disposition of these lands; and we are told, by the same high authority under which this bill is brought before us, that "it is our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as may be, to be a source of revenue." It would, therefore, be absurd to take them into view, in an arrangement of the duties intended to be permanent.

Fifteen millions are wanted, then, as revenue from imports, and the question is, whether, under the act of July last, they will produce a greater sum. We find in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury the following paragraph: "Taking an average of the importations, for the last six years, as a probable criterion of the ordinary importations for some years to come, the revenue from customs, at the rates of duty payable after the 3d of March next, may be estimated at eighteen millions of dollars annually."

As the Secretary has not informed us of the process by which he comes to this result, its correctness can only be tested by such data as the official documents furnish; and I confess I cannot, by any calculation which I can make, come to the same result. But, before presenting my own calculations, I must call the attention of the committee to another circumstance connected with this inquiry, of a character altogether extraordinary. The President, in his last annual message, urges the necessity of reducing the duties to the revenue standard; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report accompanying it, makes use of the following language, speaking of his report of 1831, communicated to this House at their former session:

"In the last annual report on the state of the finances, the probable expenses for all objects other than the public debt, were estimated at fifteen millions. This is still believed to be a fair estimate, and, if so, there will be an annual surplus of six millions of dollars."

"Still firmly convinced of the truth of the reasons then presented, for a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, I am again urged, by a sense of duty, to suggest that a further reduction of six millions of dollars be made, to take effect after the year 1833. Whether that shall consist altogether of a diminution of the duties on imports, or partly of a relinquishment of the public lands as a source of revenue, as then suggested, it will be for the wisdom of Congress to determine."

"Deeply impressed with these reflections, which are now rendered more urgent by the reduced and limited demands of the public service, I had the honor at the last session of Congress to recommend a reduction of the duties to the revenue standard. The force of those, and similar considerations, and of that recommendation, may be supposed to have received at that time the sanction of Congress, and to have formed a motive of the act of the 14th of July last, notwithstanding that it was not then deemed practicable fully to adopt the recommendation of the department."

Mr. Chairman, on reading these passages in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I thought it the language of pretty severe reprimand, because we had failed to carry into effect his recommendations for reducing the revenue, and as urging that circumstance as the ground for requiring our further action. In the hurry in which that bill was made to take its final shape, it was not easy to calculate precisely the comparative reduction which it made, as compared with the bill from the tre-surry: my own impression, at the time, was, that it went quite as far, or farther, than that bill. The language of the Secretary, therefore, a good deal surprised me, as indicating a result so different from my own expectation. It occurred to me, in examining into this matter, to inquire, how far we had failed in our duty; how far we had fallen short of the Secretary's recommendation. I will not conceal my astonishment at the result; and, sir, I ask, what will be the astonishment of this House, should it turn out, after all, that the bill of July provides for as great a reduction of the revenue, as that furnished us by the Secretary himself? Nay, more sir; what will they think, should the reduction under our own bill go beyond that proposed by the Secretary a full million of dollars? It is, indeed, passing strange; but it is said figures cannot lie, and I can bring them to no other result, as the following table will show:

Reductions of duty by the bill of 14th July, 1832, as compared with that reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, on 27th April, 1832, taking the imports of 1831, according to the table annexed to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, as furnished by the Treasury Department, as the basis.

There may be a few other small items, operating both ways, but which cannot affect the result; besides, the addition on raw wool is altogether greater than will ever result in practice: the importation of 1831 being wholly unprecedented, and more than three times the amount imported in any one previous year. It may, therefore, be safely assumed, that the act of July, 1832, reduced the amount of duties more than a million of dollars below those proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, assuming the import of 1831 as the basis. It would seem, therefore, that if the duties have not yet been reduced to the revenue standard, it is not the fault of the two Houses of Congress, who have actually gone beyond the recommendation of the Executive.

The question then arises, have we any good ground for believing that we shall be overburdened with an excess of revenue under the existing law?

It is notorious that, at the present moment, instead of there being any money in the treasury, the balance is actually the other way. In the correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States Bank, it was admitted that the Government would be short at least some few hundred thousand dollars of the amount requisite to pay off the three per cents. on the first of January, and which it wished the Bank to advance on interest. So that, at present, we are in fact somewhat behindhand. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. INGHAM] of the Committee of Ways and Means, has shown conclusively, that, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, the balance in the treasury on the first of January, 1835, will be less than the appropriations which will then be outstanding. I do not perceive that this statement is at all impugned by that of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. VERPLANCK.] The only difference appears to be, that the latter thinks we ought to be constantly in debt to the outstanding appropriations some millions; trusting that they will not be called for until we can receive the amount from new sources. This appears to me rather a niggardly course, as a permanent one, for a Government free of debt, and with a reduced income, as it leaves them no available fund for possible contingencies.

The most important question, however, is, whether the permanent revenue under the act of 14th July, 1832, will probably exceed the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, the estimated necessary expenditure. In recommending the measure of reduction to us, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report of December, 1831, made use of the following very sensible language:

"It will be difficult precisely to graduate the revenue to the expenditure. The necessity of avoiding the possibility of a deficiency in the revenue, and the perpetual fluctuation in the demand and supply, render such a task almost impracticable. An excess of revenue, therefore, under any prudent system of duties, may be for a time unavoidable; but this can be better ascertained by experience, and the evil obviated, either by enlarging the expenditure for the public service, or by reducing the duties on such articles as the condition of the country would best admit."

I agree fully in these sentiments, and they would seem to offer an irresistible argument against disturbing the existing law, until tested by experience. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his communications of the last year, assumed the amount of imports for 1830 as the basis of his calculation, being 70,876,000 dollars. He now assumes the average of six years, including 1832, which gives 86,260,000 dollars, whilst the Committee of Ways and Means assume 100,000,000.

The importation of 1830 was a very small one. In fact, the only correct mode of estimation for the future is to take an average of years, and in the present case the result will be, as nearly as may be, the same, whether we take an average of four or six years. Taking, then, the average adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, as a fair basis of calculation, and I shall attempt to show that it is the utmost which can safely be taken, from the gross imports of 86,200,000 dollars must be deducted the amount of foreign goods exported, which, on an average of the same period of six years, amount to a fraction over 20,000,000, leaving 66,200,000 as the nett amount of foreign imports, including those free and those liable to duty, consumed in the country, and from which the revenue from imposts is to be derived. The only accurate mode of estimating this revenue, under a change of duty, would be, to take the average amount of each article, liable to duty under the new act, imported for the last six years, and, deducting the quantities exported, calculate the duty on the balance, as the average nett quantity consumed. We have been furnished with no such table; and, in the absence of it, I must take such data as we have. The table annexed to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means gives twenty-three dollars and sixty-six cents per cent. as the average duty payable on the entire import, under the act of July last, taking the importation of 1831 as a basis of calculation. This ratio will give, on the nett import of 66,200,000, a revenue of 15,660,000 dollars, subject, however, to a deduction for the expenses of collection, of about a million of dollars.

Now, sir, I think it can be made apparent, that this mode of estimation gives too high a result, because the import of 1831 embraced imports of certain articles paying the highest rates of duty, vastly greater than the average imports of the same articles for six years, or than can safely be calculated on for the future, as the following:

	Import of 1831.	Average of 4 years.	Rate of duty.
Wool costing over 8 cents,	1,234,000	400,000	54 per ct.
Woollens subject to high duties,	6,100,000	4,100,000	50 "
Cottons,	16,090,000	10,800,000	42 "

Now, it must be apparent that this excessive importation in these particular articles goes to increase the rate of duty on the whole importation very materially over any average of years which can be taken. From a calculation which I have made, these items will reduce the average rate of duty from twenty-three dollars sixty-six cents to twenty-two dollars forty-four cents per cent.; and in this table no allowance is made for the reduction of one-half the duty on wines after the 3d of March, 1834. Putting all these things together, I estimate the excess arising from this mode of estimation, as amounting to at least a million of dollars on the nett revenue, which will reduce it below $14,000,000, on the basis assumed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

There is another view of it. The Secretary of the Treasury communicated to this House on the 4th of June last, through the Committee on Manufactures, a table, containing an estimate of the duties which would accrue under the bill reported by Mr. Adams, the chairman of that committee; taking, as a basis, the importation of 1830, on which the nett revenue was calculated and made to amount to $12,763,000. The import of that year was a small one, amounting to $70,876,000, whilst the foreign exports were $14,387,000, leaving a nett importation of $56,489,000, on which the revenue was to be levied. The bill of the 14th of July last made very considerable further reductions, especially in the articles of tea, coffee, silks, linens, sail duck, and certain descriptions of woollens, amounting, after making full allowance for additions on a few small articles, to more than a million of dollars; or, allowing for a proportionate amount of debentures, making a deduction from the nett revenue, calculated in that table, of full $800,000, and reducing the entire nett revenue, on the basis then assumed, below $12,000,000. If, then, $56,489,000, the nett importation of 1830, gives a nett revenue of $12,000,000, under the law of last July, $66,200,000, the nett average import of the last six years, will give $14,100,000, from which is still to be deducted $300,000 for the reduction on wines, after March, 1834, leaving the permanent nett revenue, on the basis assumed by the Secretary of the Treasury, $13,800,000. This appears to me the only safe estimate which we can make from data in our possession.

It is therefore apparent that, instead of our having any troublesome surplus of revenue over $15,000,000, under the existing law, the probability is, that it will actually fall considerably short of that sum. It is true the Committee of Ways and Means assume $100,000,000 as the probable amount of future importations, and have assumed that as the safe basis of legislation in establishing a permanent system of revenue, presenting the singular anomaly, that in July last we were furnished by the Treasury Department with the basis of $70,000,000, as a datum for legislation, and in the succeeding December our Committee of Ways and Means say $100,000,000 is not too high an estimate, and all this under the same administration. This discrepancy alone would furnish a sufficient reason why we should not meddle with this subject at the present session. It is, however, easy to show that the assumption of $100,000,000 of gross imports, or of $80,000,000 of nett imports, as the basis of a revenue system, is wholly unsafe and unwarrantable. It would seem to have resulted from the fact that our official tables of imports give the amount for the year ending 30th September, 1831, at $103,191,000, and for 1832 at $101,036,000, which might, at first sight, give an air of permanence to these high sums; but a careful examination will show the fallacy which would result from doing so. Every one acquainted with commercial operations, is aware how periods of depression and elevation of prices, of caution and overtrade, follow each other in a sort of irregular circle of years. This is not the occasion to discuss the causes of these fluctuations; but the fact is notorious. Depression is followed by caution, which leads to successful operations, which are pushed on to full, and finally to overtrade, until another depression completes the revolution of the wheel.

The return of these periods is very irregular, but the years 1829-'30-'31 and '32 are a striking illustration of a complete revolution in the short period of four years. Every one knows that the year 1831 was a year of great overtrade; of great prosperity in the commencement of it, and great loss in the end. Every one, therefore, was prepared to see a great increase in our imports of that year, which expectation was, in a great measure, satisfied by finding our official tables giving an import of one hundred and three millions for 1831, after seventy millions in 1830. But the fact that the import of 1832 should still come up to one hundred and one millions, was somewhat puzzling. I was at a loss to account for it myself. Having some recollection of the period when the great increase of imports commenced, and was in operation, it occurred to me that the quarterly returns might throw some light on this matter. Accordingly I obtained from the Treasury Department the following statement of the aggregate amount of imports for the several quarters of the years ending 30th September, 1831 and 1832.

2d do do June 30, 1831,	28,083,848	to 1832,	31,645,395
3d do do Sept. 1831,	31,693,418	to 1832,	22,372,887

101,889,897

Here the whole mystery is solved; the imports for the year from 1st April, 1831, to 31st March, 1832, amount to the enormous sum of $115,394,891; and every one conversant with the state of trade during that period must be aware that it is precisely that in which the overtrade commenced and reached its crisis. If any doubt the fact of this overtrade in the year 1831, I would refer them to the series of questions propounded by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] to the President of the United States Bank, during the last session, the chief object of which was to show that this great overtrade was owing to the increased issues of the United States Bank. The fact of the overtrade was admitted, and the difference between the gentleman from New York and the President of the Bank was simply that the former charged the Bank with having caused the overtrade, by an improper increase of its circulation, whilst Mr. Biddle insisted that the Bank had merely met the demand for an increased circulation, resulting from an increase of trade. It is not my purpose to discuss the question which party was in the right. It is unquestionably true that overtrade and a greatly expanded bank circulation are always coincident; they act and react upon each other, and it is not always easy to say which is cause and which is effect. It is evident, then, that there was a year of great overtrade, which has greatly increased the official returns of imports for the years 1831 and 1832, and that those returns form no proper basis of calculation for the future, without joining with them the two preceding years of restricted importation, 1829 and 1830. If other evidence be required of the danger of taking the years 1831 and 1832 as a criterion for the future, it may be found by a reference to our exports. It is evident that there must be a pretty near correspondence between our domestic exports and the nett amount of our foreign imports which are received in exchange for them. Accordingly, we find the exports of domestic produce for six years, from 1825 to 1830, average $57,400,000; whilst the imports of foreign goods for the same period, after deducting foreign goods exported, average $60,200,000. Now the exports of domestic produce for the years 1831 and 1832 average $62,175,000; whilst the imports of foreign goods, after deducting those exported, average $79,900,000; making an excess, from the proportion which our imports bear to exports, for the preceding six years, of about thirty millions of dollars; that is to say, our imports have outrun or gone in advance of our exports that sum, and must wait for the latter to come up with them. We accordingly perceive a great falling off in the imports of the last two quarters of the year ending September 30, 1832; five millions in the first, and nine millions in the second, as compared with the corresponding quarters of 1831. This falling off must continue much longer, unless this balance against us is paid for by loans. We have, in fact, made loans to the amount of twelve millions on this account; seven millions by the bank of the State of Louisiana, negotiated by the Barings, and five millions by the United States Bank against the three per cents.; the last, to be sure, is only temporary, and is only postponing the day of payment for a year. It is very true that some gentlemen calculate on a great increase of importation, in consequence of a reduction of duties, and a consequent increase of the revenue; but I cannot agree with them in the latter result; the increase will be in free goods, or goods paying little duty, and the probability is, there will be a corresponding diminution in commodities paying high duties; so that the revenue is as likely to be diminished as increased.

JAN. 22, 1833.]

[H. or R.]

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that I have made it apparent that the basis of an average of six years, as adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, is as high an amount of imports as it is safe to assume in relation to the revenue; and that we have no ground for believing that the revenue will, for years to come, exceed fifteen millions of dollars. I am myself fully of opinion that it will fall short of that sum, and thus the operations of the Treasury, for three years to come, will be very much cramped, instead of our being burdened with an excess. There is no good reason, then, why we should pass this bill on the alleged ground of a necessity of reducing the revenue to the expenditure of the Government. That has been done already.

Vol. IX.—76

But, sir, there are other ominousgivings out in the official communications. The President, in his late message, after recommending a proper adaptation of the revenue to the wants of the Government, proceeds: "In effecting this adjustment, it is due, in justice, to the interest of the different States, and even to the preservation of the Union itself; that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry, should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war. If, upon investigation, it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to any particular interest is greater than is indispensably requisite for these objects, I recommend that it be gradually diminished; and that, as far as may be consistent with these objects, the whole scheme of duties be reduced to the revenue standard, as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will permit."

These communications have been, not inaptly, compared to the responses of the Delphic oracle, which every party was able to interpret according to his wishes. So here the text admits of a liberal or narrow construction; it may be made to cover the whole ground of the American system, or exclude it altogether. But other intimations of a more alarming character follow.

"Those who take an enlarged view of the condition of our country, must be satisfied that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war. Within this scope, on a reasonable scale, it is recommended by every consideration of patriotism and duty, which will doubtless always secure to it a liberal and efficient support. But, beyond this object, we have already seen the operation of the system productive of discontent."

There is no great ambiguity here; and the plain English of it is, that the whole system of protection to American industry must be swept by the board. That system, which for sixteen years has been acquiring stability and strength; which has brought the country to a state of prosperity of which the annals of the world afford no parallel; this whole fabric is to be swept away with a haste and rapidity unexampled in our legislation.

Is it pretended that the system is not a wise one in itself? No, sir, not that I am aware of. This very Congress have, by a large majority, affirmed the wisdom of the system; they have, in public estimation, given assurance to the system by the act of last July. And yet this same Congress are now called upon to retract all their opinions upon this subject, and, at the bidding of Executive power, to place their names on record, in black and white, in everlasting, if not in damning contrast with themselves.

Can such things be? Is this a Government of the people? a Government of public opinion? A distinguished gentleman of South Carolina, [Mr. McDuffrie,] in a speech of the last session, drew a most glowing picture of the oppression and tyranny growing out of the democratic form of Government, a Government of majorities, of king Demos. Methinks the form of our Government is changed. It seems to be a perfect monarchy. We are living under a new dynasty: and, perhaps before the close of the session, the same gentleman may favor us with a eulogium on king Monos. Is it not so, sir? May we not, with equal truth, ask, in the language put into the mouth of Cassius by the great dramatic poet, in reference to Julius Caesar:

"When could they say before, who talked of us,
That our wide walls encompassed but one man?"

What is the ground for this change? What is the pretext? It is said the South is discontented; that the South considers the tariff unequal in its operation, perhaps unconstitutional. South Carolina has placed herself in an attitude of opposition to the Government; and the Atlantic States, south of the Potomac, will join her, and secede from the Union, unless the tariff system is repealed instantly. This is the ground, and the whole ground, on which it is expected that this bill will pass. But does this House believe that this system acts oppressively and injuriously upon any portion of the Union? The admission would be an admission of their own shame, unless some new light, some new conviction, has burst in upon them. If that be the case, it must have been by intuition. The allegation is, that the system operates unequally and injuriously upon the States employing slave labor, whilst it is beneficial and advantageous to the States employing free labor. And what, Mr. Chairman, is the argument to support this proposition? In the whole discussion of the last session, I heard no argument used to establish this partial injury, but the argument invented by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] and which has since, under the influence of that gentleman's eloquence, been adopted by the State of South Carolina, as the ground of her proceedings. It may, therefore, now be properly called the South Carolina theory. That theory is, that the farmers and planters who produce the articles which are exported from a nation, bear the whole burden of the tax levied in impost duties on the commodities imported into that nation, whether they consume any portion of those commodities or not; in other words, that a duty of forty per cent. on imports consumed in the North, takes forty bales of cotton out of every hundred produced by the cotton planter. This illustration has also given it the name of the "forty bale theory."

I am not going to discuss the argument by which that theory is supported; that was done sufficiently at the last session. But, I ask if there are ten members of this House; perhaps there are ten; but I boldly ask, are there twenty who believe in that argument? Nay, more; are there twenty men in this nation, north of the Potomac, having any acquaintance with commercial operations, or any knowledge of the science of political economy, who do not consider the theory a mere rhapsody of metaphysical sophistries? All may not be able to unravel the web so ingeniously put together; but all perceive that it is, and must be, false.

Now, I aver that I know of no other argument which goes to show the operation of the tariff to be unequal in its character, but this South Carolina, or forty bale theory. The supporters of that theory expressly admit that its supposed inequality rests solely on that argument; and that if impost duties fall exclusively on the consumers of the foreign commodities, there is no inequality in the case. The only other argument entitled to any consideration is this: that certain products and manufactures of the North, consumed in the South, are enhanced in price by the protecting tariff, and thus operate to their especial injury. But, to my apprehension, this argument resolves itself into the general question of general expediency, so often discussed and so often decided in both branches of the National Legislature. If Virginia pays an extra price for Pennsylvania iron, so does New England. If Virginia pays an extra price for New England woollens, so does every man in New England. The great interest of New England, as of all the other sections of the Union, is agricultural; and I should be glad to be informed how the wheat grower of Virginia suffers more from the system than the wheat grower of New York, or the grazier of Massachusetts; all of whose productions are regulated by the price in foreign markets, as well as that of the cotton planter.

The question of the advantages of a system of free trade, or of duties protecting home productions, is a question of theory against practice. Free trade has been very well argued by speculative writers, on grounds which might prove very correct in a world destined to universal peace, and actuated by a spirit of universal philanthropy. But, unhappily, these speculative theorists have not made the slightest progress in persuading their own nations to adopt their views in practice. And is there an individual on this floor who will have the temerity to maintain that the opening our ports on the principles of free trade to other nations closing their doors upon our productions, would not be to prostrate our industry and prosperity at the foot of foreign nations? to submit to pay them precisely what tribute they choose to levy upon us?

I except, however, from this inquiry the gentlemen of the South Carolina school, and yet they are the last who can, with any consistency, deny the general expediency of the protecting system, because one of their strongest arguments to show the inequality of the system, is, the statement of the fact, that the whole North is flourishing in unprecedented prosperity under the influence of this system, from which circumstance the truly logical inference is drawn, by a process of argument equally logical, that this prosperity must, of necessity, be subtracted from their own. The most that can be said of any real inequality in the system is this, that, whilst the intended and expected effect of attracting capital into the protected branches of industry has been operative and effectual in the Middle and Northern States, the same result has not been produced in those of the South. The reason must be, either because the profits of slave cultivation are so great as to leave no inducement to employ capital in manufactures, or that the effect of slave labor is to indispose the white population to that persevering and thrifty industry necessary to the prosecution of these branches, and on which the prosperity of the North depends. It is no answer to this argument to say that slave labor cannot be employed in manufactures. Suppose it cannot, there is white labor enough. The white population of the States who complain most of this system, is upwards of two millions.

In fact, however, although not acting so quickly, the system seems beginning to act effectually in many of those States. Maryland was among the first to adopt, and took the lead in supporting, this system. Virginia, I am told, is proceeding rapidly in the establishment of manufactures. I understand several cotton mills are building, as well as in operation, both in Richmond and Petersburg.

I am informed by an honorable gentleman of Georgia, [Mr. CLAYTON,] that twelve or fifteen cotton mills are building in that State, to share in those profits which, at the last session, he informed us he was making himself in that business. Several establishments are making in Louisiana, and I believe also in Mississippi. And it would seem that the fanatics, who are hurrying South Carolina to her ruin, are acting under the conviction that the system, left to itself, would soon work itself into favor, even in their own region.

The only ground, after all, on which the immediate and hurried action of this House can be justified, is, that it is necessary to the preservation of the Union. Good heaven! Mr. Chairman, has it come to this? Has the national bond of union, under which every citizen of these United States has grown proud, even to a by-word amongst those foreigners who visit us, become so weak, that it cannot be trusted to hold together for a single twelve-month? Impossible! Nothing in private life is more hazardous than to act under the influence of panic. It can hardly be less so in legislating upon the vital interests of a great and growing empire. Can it be strengthening the Union, for this Legislature, before the echo of the President's message can return upon the capital from the distant mountains, to do an act which shall be felt in every vein and artery of the body politic? Can it be preserving the Union, for its chosen guardians to abandon in af-fright a system which they were sent here to protect? a system which they themselves, and a vast majority of this nation, believe to be the source of their present, and essential to their future, prosperity? Can peace and safety result from such a course? Can it preserve the Union, or make it worth preserving, for this Legislature, in this state of agitation, to pass this bill; and by the stroke of the pen by which it becomes a law, to prostrate private property, with a recklessness, if not wantonness, which has no parallel in the legislation of civilized nations?

Will it promote the cause of free Government in Europe, for this, their model, their pattern, in wicked, midnight haste, to pass an act, annihilating private property, with less reluctance or consideration, as I verily believe, than can be found in the annals of the petty despotisms of Asia or Africa? Sir, there is one evil greater than disunion itself: it is to make the Union not worth preserving.

Mr. Chairman, I am not insensible to the dangers which threaten the republic. One of the States of this Union is in rebellion, peaceable rebellion; or if that word sound too harsh, be it a crisis; or, to be more strictly correct, South Carolina is in a state of nullification. But is there any danger so imminent in this? She has done what it was apparent twelve months ago she would do. She has put in practice, as a remedy, a political theory nearly as absurd as the system of political economy on which she founds her grievances. But, sir, in my apprehension, the danger of the present crisis is past; nullification is nullified. The President's proclamation, ratified, as it has been, by one universal burst of public opinion, has killed it. It is true South Carolina is raising troops; but does any one apprehend danger to the Union from South Carolina, by force? with a white population of two hundred and fifty thousand, equally divided, and holding in her bosom three hundred thousand slaves? No, Mr. Chairman, no one apprehends danger from South Carolina alone. No one supposes that South Carolina will undertake to set herself up as a nation by herself. She is acting, and we shall act, under other views. Our sense of danger, and the real danger, lies in the circumstance, that throughout all the Atlantic States owning property in slaves, from the Potomac to the Mississippi, there is a strong feeling of common interest; a strong sympathy for South Carolina; a violent clamor, a great excitement against the protective system; an idea, more or less general, but certainly of a large majority, that the system is unequal in its operation, and injurious to them. Nor is it surprising that this state of feeling should exist. Whoever listened to, or has read the speeches which were delivered in this House, during the last session of Congress, by a certain party, and which were dispersed, thick as autumnal leaves, through the whole region of the South, with other incendiary tracts, all calculated, if not intended, to rouse the whole South to madness, cannot be surprised at the result. We were told in this hall that the protective system was a vampire, by which the North was sucking the warm blood of the South; that the free States were prairie wolves, gorging their jaws by instinct in the blood of the South, whilst oppression, robbery, and plunder were sounded to every note of the gamut. Is the result surprising? Those who could not understand the argument on which their wrongs were founded, could understand the application; and coming from such sources, can it be wondered at that the existence of these wrongs should be believed?

Now I suppose that it will be conceded that a great majority of the people of the States north of the Potomac, and of the West, believe the system of protection to be one of sound policy; that the practical operation of it has been beneficial to them, and injurious to none; that the prostration of the system will inflict real injury on them, by paralyzing their industry, without proving of any benefit to the South; but that, on the contrary, they will suffer in the general injury. This is the state of the case. It certainly presents matter for grave consideration, for wise and deliberate counsel. But do we lessen the danger by refusing to look it calmly in the face? The danger is disunion. Shall we strengthen this Union, and lessen this danger, by yielding up what a majority of this House in their consciences believe, what a majority of this nation believe, to be a great national good, in compliance to opinions which we believe to be wholly erroneous? That such is the opinion of a majority of this House, stands on record in the journals of the last session, under the sanction and responsibility with which we perform the duties of our high trust. Under these circumstances, I also ask, in the language of the President, what shall be done? Shall we sacrifice great interests under the influence of panic, or shall we examine fearlessly into the nature of the malady, and ascertain if it be capable of a permanent cure?

It is apparent that this great difference of opinion grows out of one great circumstance in the condition of the different sections of the country—the existence and non-existence of slavery. The great question is, whether this circumstance presents any real incompatibility or difference of interests, so as to make a system which is favorable to one section actually injurious to another. This is rather a question of fact. I am favorably inclined to the proposition of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BRADSHAW,] or something of similar character, for a large committee, or for commissioners, to inquire into the actual operations of the tariff; to bring the sufferings of the South into something like a tangible shape; to give us facts, of which we have so little, in the place of theory, of which we have so much. I should like an inquiry into the state and effect of manufactures, thorough and searching, like those which are gone into before committees of the British Parliament on all questions affecting great interests.

Then, sir, there is another consideration connected with this subject. The tariff is put forward as the great, the only ground of complaint; but is it the only ground of apprehension, of fear? Sir, it is idle to disguise it. Every man who hears me knows that there is a question behind the tariff, to which that is but as dust in the balance; a question which includes: what may emphatically be called the Southern interest, the Southern feeling; which includes also the fear and apprehension of the South that the General Government may one day interfere with the right of property in slaves. This is the bond which unites the South in a solid phalanx, and this is the key to their jealousy of allowing a liberal construction of the constitution in relation to the powers of the General Government. Why does Virginia pass weeks together in discussing the abstract right of secession from the Union? Does she wish to secede? No, sir, except in one event. She wishes to keep the door open, in case the question of emancipation should ever be seriously brought before Congress. There lie on the table before you certain resolutions of the State of Georgia, proposing a convention of the States for certain enumerated purposes. I noticed, when these resolutions were reported in the Georgia Legislature, an additional proposition for the consideration of the convention, viz. what further security should be obtained for a certain description of property. This was struck out, by unanimous consent; and why? Was it that this last consideration, like the postscript to a letter, was not considered important? Not at all; but it was not thought expedient to express any distrust of the security under the present constitution. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I believe the South are unduly sensitive on this point. I know of no Northern statesman who calls in question the inviolability of the property in slaves under the constitution. I am sure the people of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, have no more disposition than they believe they have right to interfere in this matter in any way. But, sir, this extreme sensitiveness and apprehension on the part of the South in this matter, is an element too important to be overlooked in adjusting their supposed grievances.

There is another question. Does the South really wish the continuance of the Union? I have no doubt of the attachment of the mass of the people of the South to the Union, as well as of every other section of the country; but it may well be doubted whether certain leading politicians have not formed bright visions of a Southern confederacy. This would seem to be the only rational ground for accounting for the movements in South Carolina. A Southern confederacy, of which South Carolina should be the central State, and Charleston the commercial emporium, may present some temptations for individual ambition.

And now, Mr. Chairman, having shown what appear to me sufficient reasons why we should not act at all at present, I proceed to the inquiry whether the proposed bill is such a one as we ought to pass, on the supposition that the public exigency requires us to pass any bill at all. Its great and leading character is, that it strikes a fatal blow at the two great branches of manufacture, of wool and of cotton; that it will annihilate an immense amount of capital invested in mills and machinery, now employed in those manufactures.

Before going into details, however, I must advert to the manner in which the public mind has been prepared for this great sacrifice of capital. I was forcibly struck, the other day, with the story told us by an honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] of a man who had determined the destruction of a harmless animal, and, unwilling to perpetrate the deed himself, said he would accomplish his purpose by giving it a bad name.

Much in the same way, it appears to me, has the public mind been prepared for the sacrifice of the manufacturers. Sir, we have all seen, for nearly a twelvemonth, the scurrilous newspapers venting their abuse upon this interest; but they are unworthy of my notice. The first indication from authority is to be found in the veto message returning the United States Bank bill, as follows:

"Experience should teach us wisdom. Most of the difficulties our Government now encounters, and most of the dangers which impend over our Union, have sprung from an abandonment of the legitimate objects of Government by our national legislation, and the adoption of such principles as are embodied in this act. Many of our rich men have not been content with equal protection and equal benefits, but have besought us to make them richer by act of Congress. By attempting to gratify their desires, we have, in the results of our legislation, arrayed section against section, interest against interest, and man against man, in a fearful commotion which threatens to shake the foundation of our Union. It is time to pause in our career, to review our principles, and, if possible, revive that devoted patriotism and spirit of compromise which distinguished the sages of the revolution, and the fathers of our Union. If we cannot, at once, in justice to interests vested under improvident legislation, make our Government what it ought to be, we can, at least, take a stand against all new grants of monopolies and exclusive privileges, against any prostitution of our Government to the advancement of the few at the expense of the many, and in favor of compromise and gradual reform in our code of laws and system of political economy."

This certainly is ominous language, although somewhat obscure. The message to this Congress, at the present session, speaks somewhat plainer.

"But those who have vested their capital in manufacturing establishments cannot expect that the people will continue, permanently, to pay high taxes for their benefit, when the money is not required for any legitimate purpose in the administration of the Government. In some sections of the republic its influence is deprecated as tending to concentrate wealth into a few hands, and as creating those germs of dependence and vice which, in other countries, have characterized the existence of monopolies, and proved so destructive of liberty and the general good."

But the most extraordinary demonstrations, in this particular, may be found in the communications of the Secretary of the Treasury. That officer, in his report on the finances, made in December, 1831, presented the following just and statesmanlike views:

"To distribute the duties in such a manner, as far as that may be practicable, as to encourage and protect the labor of the people of the United States from the advantages of superior skill and capital, and the rival preferences of foreign countries; to cherish and preserve those manufactures which have grown up under our own legislation, which contribute to the national wealth, and are essential to our independence and safety, to the defence of the country, to the supply of its necessary wants, and to the general prosperity, is considered to be an indispensable duty. The vast amount of property employed in the northern, western, and middle portions of the Union, upon the faith of our own system of laws, and in which the interests of every branch of our industry are involved, could not be immediately abandoned without the most ruinous consequences."

And yet, sir, in his report just made us at the commencement of this session, we find, after adverting to the protective system as "that legislation especially which confers favors upon particular classes," he proceeds:

"To perpetuate a system of encouragement, growing out of a different state of things, would be to confer advantages upon the manufacturing which are not enjoyed by any other branch of labor in the United States, and to convert the favor and bounty of the Government into permanent obligations of right, acquiring strength in proportion to their continuance.

"It will be conceded that, when the fair rate of profit attendant upon the sagacious employment of capital in the United States is satisfactorily ascertained, it may be wise so far to protect any important branch against the injurious effects of foreign rivalry, as may be necessary to preserve for it the same rate of profit as is enjoyed by others. If, however, by protective legislation, or otherwise, the proprietor of an actual capital shall be enabled to employ it in manufactures as advantageously and profitably as in any other branch of labor, all things considered, he could not reasonably demand more. The rate of protection which should enable manufacturing labor, conducted upon borrowed capital, to indemnify the lender, and, in addition, to realize the regular rate of profit for itself, would not merely confer undue favor upon the manufacturer, at the expense of every other employment, but bring the influence of the capitalist in direct conflict with the general mass of the people. It might even be apprehended that, by such means, there would be an accumulation of power in the hands of particular classes, strong enough to control the Government itself. If these observations are entitled to respect, little doubt is entertained that, in a tariff framed on proper principles, the reduction of six millions, now recommended, may, for the most part, be made upon those commonly denominated protected articles, without prejudice to the reasonable claims of existing establishments."

These sentiments emanate from high public functionaries whom I wish to treat with all becoming respect. I am bound to consider them as sincere opinions, with however little examination they may have been taken up; but, Mr. Chairman, as the representative of a great amount of capital which has been induced to embark in the business of manufactures under the sanction of your laws—laws passed for the express purpose of giving capital that direction, it becomes my duty to protest, in the strongest terms of which I am capable, against the theory and the application of the sentiments contained in these extracts. Why is the odious term of monopolists applied to the manufacturers? A monopoly is an exclusive privilege. What exclusive privilege attaches to a business which is open to every individual in the United States? How is the manufacturing of cotton more of a monopoly than the planting of cotton or rice, or the growing or grinding of wheat? They are equally occupations open to every body. Similar productions are equally subject to an impost duty, imported from abroad.

The Tariff Bill.

Then, sir, we are told of favored classes; of favors; of rich men not being content with equal protection, and having besought the Government to make them richer by acts of Congress. Sir, I deny the fact. I deny it in toto. When did capital or capitalists ask you to regulate the employment of their capital? Never. The mere possessors of capital are every where in favor of free trade. Who were in favor of your tariffs? and who opposed them? Sir, this House, from motives of public policy, enacted the tariff laws with a view to induce capital to go into the business of manufacture. The capitalists said, "No; let us alone." Well, sir, you pass your laws, on the strength of which capital is induced to take the channel indicated by your legislation. Millions upon millions are invested in mills and machinery, which can be converted to no other purpose, carrying competition to the very lowest point of profit in other occupations. And shall we now be told that we are grasping monopolists, unworthy the protection of the laws? Rich, forsooth! Dangerous, perhaps, to liberty! Strong enough, perhaps, to control the Government!

Mr. Chairman, I care not how low may be the sources from which these sentiments may have been drawn, nor from how high places they may have been held up to the view of this nation: I pronounce them the genuine principles of revolutionary radicalism; they are the principles of Jack Cade; they are the principles of French jacobinism, in the worst periods of the revolution, when the cry of "Rich aristocrat!" met the response of "à la lanterne!" and consigned the unhappy victim to the nearest lamp-post.

Let this war upon property be carried out, and we need not trouble ourselves about preserving the Union; it will not be worth the pains. It strikes at the root of the principle of accumulation—the very foundation of all civilization. On this point I may appeal to the gentlemen of the South who made us such eloquent harangues during the last session on the inviolability of property. Will it strengthen their confidence in the security of their peculiar property to see ours sacrificed without remorse? Will the name of rich slaveholder be a better security in this warfare, than that of grasping monopolist?

Now, sir, what is the fact in relation to capital? It is the universally admitted theory in political economy, especially of the free trade writers, from Adam Smith down to Senior and McCulloch, that the productions of labor are precisely in proportion to the capital devoted to the maintenance of that labor. Capital is the fund for the payment of wages. This theory lies also at the bottom of the American system; and I beg leave to quote the following passage from the address of the New York convention:

"All the means of human enjoyment, and all the accumulations of wealth, are the product of human labor. National happiness and national wealth are, therefore, promoted in proportion to the active industry of the community; and that industry is in proportion to the inducements to labor arising from the amount and certainty of its remuneration. The immediate instrument for calling labor into action is capital. Capital is necessary to furnish the laborer with the means of applying his labor to advantage, whether in the simple tools of agriculture, and some of the mechanic arts, or in the complicated and expensive machinery applied to certain branches of manufacture, the modern improvements in which have added so much to the productive power of man.

"It is a settled axiom that the industry of a nation is in proportion to the capital devoted to its maintenance; it is, therefore, thought to be a wise policy to multiply the inducements to apply capital to the employment of labor at home rather than to the purchase abroad, and traffic in commodities of foreign production, by which the capital of the country is made to set in motion foreign labor. This is founded on the principle, universally admitted, that there is, in every nation, a power or capability of labor beyond that actually put forth, and that its effective industry is proportioned to the stimulus applied in the shape of capital. This constitutes the American system. It invites the application of American capital to stimulate American industry. It imposes a restriction, in the form of an impost duty, on certain products of foreign labor; but, so far as relates to American capital, or American labor, it simply offers security and inducement to the one, and gives energy and vigor to the other."

I quote this the more readily, because it is an argument which I have never seen answered. Now, sir, what will be the effect of annihilating this capital now employed in paying the wages of labor? To the capitalist, it is an absolute loss; a sudden blow; and there's the end. But the withdrawal of the capital which paid the wages of labor, in its different departments, will be a permanent paralysis acting directly upon the laboring classes. Why is the price of labor five pence a day in Ireland, but because there is no capital to give it employment? The country does not afford sufficient security to induce capitalists to place their property there. Here, sir, we are told of the great profits of the manufacturers, as if this, if true, would furnish a good ground for interference in reducing them. I deny that it would do so; because, if there is any one principle of universal operation, it is the tendency of high prices and high profits to cause an immediate competition, and thus reduce prices and profits as low or lower than the general level in other branches. I recollect, sir, that, about the year 1818, upland cotton, certainly for two, and, I believe, for three years, sold for upwards of thirty cents a pound. What was the consequence? So rapid an extension of the cultivation as to have reduced the price one-half in 1820. Take a more familiar instance. The price of coal during the last winter, in consequence of a short supply, rose to double the usual prices; the effect of which has been, that, at the present moment, the price of coal is lower in the large cities than it has been for twenty years. The manufacturers of both wool and cotton have felt the full effect of this spirit of competition. Taken together, I do not believe that either branch has given a return of the capital invested, and interest. At all events, I boldly aver that, for the last nine months, no branch of trade or commerce has been so much depressed as the business of manufacturing. I mean to say that a given amount of capital invested in ships, or in commerce, whether in the China trade, the coffee trade, the whale fishery, or in general trade, or in bank or insurance stocks, would command, and will now command, more money than a like amount invested in the best manufacturing stocks whatever. On this point, I challenge examination, and defy contradiction.

Sir, we have heard a great deal of rich manufacturing corporations, of overgrown corporations, as odious, dangerous monsters. On this point I have a word to say, as on no subject, perhaps, is there more general misapprehension. What is the fact? The wonderful results in the modern system of manufacture are produced by the combined action of great masses of capital. This is more especially the case in the manufacture of cotton. What, then, is the effect of those corporations, or joint stock companies? Simply to enable people of small, or moderate capital, to come into the business on equal terms with the rich. For myself, I know of no more ingenious mode of paralyzing the direct and immediate influence of wealth than those very corporations. The property of the rich capitalist, if he be rich, is taken from his control, and placed in the hands of the more active managers of the concern. The mere capitalist has no more command of it than if it were sunk in the bottom of the sea. It may be worth while to inquire how these corporations are made up. I have before me the component parts of probably the largest manufacturing corporation in the United States, the Merrimack manufacturing company, with a capital of one million five hundred thousand dollars, divided into shares of one thousand dollars each. The whole number of proprietors is one hundred and sixty; of which fifteen are single women, holding fifty-five shares; eleven widows, holding sixty-six shares; twenty trustees, holding one hundred and eight shares; fifteen executors and guardians; twenty-three professional men, ten mechanics, workmen, and agents, thirty-five merchants, holding five hundred and sixty shares; and nineteen capitalists, or men retired from business, holding two hundred and forty shares. As proof that the rich are not the only proprietors, there are twenty persons owning one share each, and thirty-eight owning but two shares each. Sir, I hope we shall hear no more of these aristocratic corporations.

H. of R.

The Tariff Bill.

There is one effect growing out of them, however, in the city which I have the honor to represent, which I think too honorable to be passed over in silence. It is this: the sons of our richest men covet the agencies of these companies, not as sinecures, but as affording an active and honorable employment; and because, with us, a useful occupation is essential to respectability.

I now come, Mr. Chairman, to an examination of the bill before us. In looking over the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, I am exceedingly at a loss, altogether puzzled, to determine on what principle it has been framed. The first intimation is that of producing equality, quoting the invitation of the President for "the removal of those financial burdens which may be found to fall unequally upon any." As we proceed, one cannot but be struck with the marks of haste with which the whole affair has been concocted. After stating that the revenue must be reduced to fifteen millions, they proceed: "The act of 1832 has made a partial reduction towards this point. But, under this act, the revenue from the customs, for the next year, is calculated, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at about eighteen millions;" and, with the income from the public lands, "exhibiting an annual excess of from five to nine millions over the just uses of the Government, and taxing every family in the United States to its share, or more than its share, of that uncalled for excess." An uncertainty of four millions is pretty vague ground for permanent legislation. But when a gentleman of the literary accuracy which distinguishes the chairman of this committee, talks of taxing every family in the United States to its full share, with the chance that some, or all, would be taxed more than their share, it is pretty good evidence, if not of panic, of a good share of that moral fear which the gentleman avows—a fear that the Union might be dissolved before this bill could be reported.

We next find the following: "The extinguishment of the debt, and the commencement of the new Presidential term, make this a fit season for permanent fiscal regulations. It is vitally important, too, to all engaged in any of those numerous commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural enterprises which are affected by changes in the rates of impost, and more exposed to suffer from uncertainty than even error in legislation, now to know the intention and policy of this Government in regard to their several interests."

Most extraordinary reasons, truly! A "new Presidential term!" So we are every four years to have new "permanent fiscal regulations." But, sir, the law of last July goes into operation precisely at the commencement of the new Presidential term; and the policy of the Government was supposed to be understood. And the whole effect of this bill is now to unsettle every thing, to disturb all the calculations and arrangements of the commercial and manufacturing community.

The following paragraph is entitled to a passing remark:

"Throwing out of view, for the present, the progressive reduction that expediency and even justice require, they have fixed the revenue to be ultimately received at a sum not exceeding 15,000,000."

It shows that the idea of justice to existing establishments did once flit across the mind of the committee, which they put out of view for the present, and it will be found it never returned. I have already anticipated any detailed remarks on the fiscal calculations of the committee: they assume 65 to 70,000,000 as the amount of dutiable commodities imported; whilst the actual quantity, on the average of six years, is less than 60,000,000. The committee proceed:

"The committee, in the bill herewith reported by them, have endeavored to arrange the duties, with reference to this principle, at rates of from ten to twenty per cent., varying from them chiefly in those instances where national independence, in time of war, seemed to demand some sacrifice in peace, (as in the case of iron,) or when it was thought that a higher or lower rate of duty would be of advantage to the revenue, without any individual injury, (as in regard to distilled spirits,) or when some branch of industry might be materially benefited by low imports on some of its raw materials. On many articles, such as wines, spirits, iron, &c. experience has shown that fraud can only be prevented by specific duties on weight or measure; and, as these rates must be graduated on the mean value of commodities of the same class or name, this may sometimes fall heavily on particular kinds and qualities of them."

We have, here, a distinct avowal of the only principle on which the committee depart from their original basis of equality. I must also ask the indulgence of the committee, to quote the following further extract from the report:

"In adjusting the several duties, they have generally conformed, unless some strong reason for a different rule was perceived, to those of the tariff act of 1816, with its short supplementary act of 1818. The act of 1816 was framed with great care and deliberation by some of our ablest statesmen, looking, at the same time, to the revenue, then so peculiarly necessary for the discharge of our large war debt, and to the preservation, during a violent transition from war to peace, of the numerous manufactures that had grown up under the double duties, and the practical prohibition of the embargo, the non-intercourse, and the war with great Britain. The vast increase of manufactures, of all sorts, in the United States, during the eight years between 1816 and 1824, proves that the framers of that tariff, in providing revenue, had not only given ample incidental security to existing manufactures, but even induced new investments of capital. So well does it appear to have been adjusted in regard to woollens, that the manufacturers of these goods, examined by the Committee on Manufactures of this House in 1828, generally agreed that their business was in a more flourishing state, under the tariff of 1816, than under the higher protection of 1824."

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

"It has, however, been the wish of the committee to guard against a sudden fluctuation of the price of goods, whether in the hands of the merchant, retailer, or manufacturer, and with that view they have made the reduction upon the more important protected articles gradual and progressive."

Now, sir, I deny altogether that the sole object of the tariff of 1816 was the preservation of existing establishments. In the cotton manufacture, as then carried on, the provisions of that act were generally thought altogether inadequate. I have formerly stated, and I now repeat, that it was under the representations and influence of the late Mr. Francis C. Lowell, that Mr. Lowndes, and others of the South Carolina delegation, were brought to support the cotton minimum of that bill: Mr. Lowell was able to convince those gentlemen, and experience has proved his correctness, that, under the influence of the power loom, then just brought into perfect use, but actually in operation in one single spot, (Waltham,) the protection of six and a fourth cents would be sufficient to establish the manufacture so far as to supersede and drive out of the market the coarse India cottons, then in general use. The fact I have repeatedly had from Mr. Lowell himself. The arrangement then appeared as desirable to South Carolina as to the North—the substitution of an American material and an American manufacture for the miserable trash of India. To effect this object, it was then thought no objection, that it imposed a prohibitory duty of from eighty to ninety per cent., as it was proclaimed and well understood that it would do.

For the latter clause of the foregoing extract, I give the committee credit. They do not put the extension of time for the reduction of duties, in certain cases for one or two years, on the footing of its being intended as any redemption of the public faith: it would be too miserable a mockery to do so. It is merely to prevent the shock of too great fluctuation to the trading community.

But, sir, on this point of the pledge of the public faith, I beg leave to refer to the following extract from the last message of the President of the United States:

"What then shall be done? Large interests have grown up under the implied pledge of our national legislation, which it would seem a violation of public faith suddenly to abandon. Nothing could justify it but the public safety, which is the supreme law. But those who have vested their capital in manufacturing establishments, cannot expect that the people will continue, permanently, to pay high taxes for their benefit, when the money is not required for any legitimate purpose in the administration of the Government. Is it not enough that the high duties have been paid as long as the money arising from them could be applied to the common benefit in the extinguishment of the public debt?"

Mr. Chairman, I think it would seem to be a violation of the public faith; and is it mere seeming? If the public safety require a sacrifice of private property, let the public treasury provide an indemnity. The laws under which this property has been invested, are declared by the constitution equally supreme with the constitution itself. Submit to this violation, and your constitution, your Union, is not worth a rush. What a question is the last! Because a state of unparalleled prosperity, under the operation of the protective system, has enabled the Government so soon to pay off the public debt, therefore the system must be abandoned. Who has not sympathized with the unhappy bird, the agonies of whose death were rendered more acute by perceiving that a feather from its own body had winged the fatal shaft. Is it not too much to be told that the success of this system has forged the weapon which is to prostrate it in the dust? The last article of the report which I shall notice, is the following:

"The committee, perceiving no sufficient reason why the consumers of foreign luxuries should not pay their share of the public burdens, propose to raise the rates of duties upon silks nearer to the average rate of duties imposed by the bill, than they now are under the act of 1832. They also propose to fix a moderate specific duty, equal to about twenty per cent. on the value upon teas, and also upon coffee, which were made wholly free of duty by the act of the last summer. This has been added from a motive of financial prudence, lest the revenue from the customs should, from any modification of the bill, or other cause, fall short of the estimate, or lest the proceeds of the public lands should be in part diverted to some other channel."

Well, sir, we have got through the pretence of reducing the revenue; the committee are now for increasing duties: and first, on silks, as luxuries.

Now, sir, I confess, if there is any one species of cant and humbug ad vulgus captandum, which I despise more than any other, it is that which we often hear, of great consideration for the poor in the levying of import duties. I should like to know what is meant by the poor, in reference to this subject. Is it paupers? If so, they are supported by the community. If it is intended to apply the term to the industrious part of the community, to the working men and working women, I deny its application. Whoever has the use of his limbs in this happy country, is rich, and has his full share of what may properly be denominated luxuries in some countries. Now, in reference to the article of silks, I ask what farmer, what mechanic, what working man is there, whose family does not wear silks, more in proportion to their property than those of the rich? If there are any class of human beings who do not wear silks in this country, it is only the slaves. Then, sir, a duty is added on tea and coffee, not, I believe, as luxuries, although I have sometimes heard them called so, but as a measure of "financial prudence." Sir, I commend their prudence; they undertook a work of reduction, and, as proof, they went manfully to work—they propose to restore the duties on tea and coffee. Comment is superfluous.

I will detain the committee but a moment, in comparing the details of the bill with the principles put forth in the report. The leading exception to equal duties is in favor of articles necessary to our independence in war. As I proceed in their table, I find side and fire arms, rifles, muskets, reduced from the protecting duty, equal to fifty-three per cent., to an ad valorem one of twenty per cent.; then "iron wire, tacks, brads, sprigs, nails, and spikes," retain their protective duty from thirty-five to ninety-six per cent. Is this a mistake of the printer, or are the latter implements of war, and the former the insignia of peace? Then, sir, we come to hemp, an article essential to naval warfare, and which is apparently protected, but the duty on cordage is so graduated, that I have several letters from manufacturers of cordage, informing me that, should this bill pass, not a ton of hemp will be imported, nor a ton of cordage manufactured in the country. The effect will be, that our ships will be wholly supplied with cordage of foreign manufacture. Then there is coal put at five cents a bushel, equal to forty-seven per cent. Is this protected as a munition of war, or is it a luxury? No, says the gentleman near me, it is a product of Virginia. Then, sir, we come to sugar, the protection on which I would be the last to abandon, especially after the classical and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. WHITE.] Sugar pays a specific duty, under the bill, of forty-six per cent. I should like to know on which of the principles avowed in the bill this duty is maintained—independence in war, equality, or luxury. Perhaps, sir, there are some protective reminiscences connected with sugar, which entitle it to special favor; sugar was the subject of a protective duty in 1816. By the act of that year, it was subject to a duty of three cents a pound; the committee reported four cents, but it was reduced in Committee of the Whole to three and a half; a motion was then made to reduce it to two and a half; this was opposed by the entire Georgia delegation, and nearly all that of South Carolina. The name of the gentleman from Georgia, on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. WILDE,] will be found on that occasion voting against the reduction. So that, with all that gentleman's zeal in favor of free trade, I apprehend he must confess to a little peccadillo on that occasion. I recollect perfectly well, as a commercial man, that about that period the idea was current, that Georgia was going to abandon the cultivation of cotton, and take up that of sugar.

I proceed to the provisions of this bill in the two great articles of woollens and cottons. Woollens are reduced in this bill from fifty to twenty per cent., besides doing away the specific duty on flannels and carpetings.

I shall not go into any details on this branch of business. Suffice it to say, that it must, of necessity, prostrate the whole manufacture—it must level it with the dust. If it arise partially, it can only be when the price of wool shall fall, not only to the price in Europe, but below it, and, by depressing the price of labor in like proportion, a great part of the capital must be annihilated.

I proceed to consider the operation of the bill on the manufacture of cottons—a manufacture which has been the subject of an accurate report by a committee of the New York convention, founded on actual returns. The capital employed in that manufacture in the autumn of 1831, and in making additional machinery, was forty-five millions; it cannot be estimated, at present, at less than fifty millions. Now, what is the manner in which this great, this successful interest is treated by the committee? Why, sir, the minimum, or specific duties of seven and a half cents a square yard on white goods, and eight and three-quarters cents on printed or colored, are done away, and an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. put in their place; that is to say, seven and a half cents is reduced on the average to one or two cents, and eight and three-quarters cents is reduced to from one and a half to three cents. And, sir, what is the ground for this radical, this enormous change to one-fourth that imposed by the favorite act of 1816? I listened, Mr. Chairman, with great attention to the explanation of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] and, also, to another member of the committee, [Mr. GILMORE,] the reason given by both was the same, that, as we were able to export coarse cottons to foreign countries, little or no protection could be necessary for any part of this manufacture. Why, sir, to judge from the explanations of the committee, I must presume that they are wholly ignorant of the fact that the business of printing calicoes is carried on in this country, and yet at least ten millions of dollars must be invested in this branch of business, making thirty-five to forty millions of yards per annum. Have the committee made any inquiry into the effect of this change on this great interest? They do not pretend that they have. Is it not lamentable to see how great interests are sported with in this enlightened Government? We had last year a Committee on Manufactures, to whom was committed the protection of the manufacturing interest; through them, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to collect information from all parts of the United States. That information is not yet before us. But, on the strength of such information as he did obtain, and I know he took very considerable pains to inquire into the state of the cotton manufacture, he decided on the present rates of specific duties. And, yet, here is a committee, knowing nothing of manufactures, who lop off three-fourths of the duty at a blow, because we export coarse cottons. Under these circumstances, it becomes necessary to enter into some details in reference to this whole manufacture. The cotton manufacture may properly enough be divided into three branches: first, the coarser description of cottons, of which a considerable part are exported; secondly, the finer goods, as shirtings, sheetings, &c.; and, thirdly, printed calicoes, various colored goods for summer wear, vestings, &c. In all these branches, competition has been carried so far as to produce an abundant supply for the entire consumption of the country, with the exception of the finer descriptions of prints, and to have brought down the profits of the business, at the present time, below the average of other employments. It is a singular fact, that, at the present moment, the manufacture of the coarse cottons for exportation is the most profitable branch of the business. These coarse cottons, of which I am furnished with a description, contain the value, as near as may be, of four and a half cents of the raw material to the square yard; the cost of manufacture is three cents, and, at the present price, produces, in cash, to the manufacturer, about, but hardly, nine cents, and giving a profit of about ten per cent. on the capital employed. It may be proper, however, to state that this result can only be produced by the employment of the very best machinery. Now, sir, it is evident that this identical description of goods could not be imported from England, even without any protecting duty at all. But the English manufacture great quantities of imitations of these goods out of the cheaper Bengal cotton, which they sell at a lower price, and it is only after ascertaining, by experience, the superior durability of our goods that they maintain themselves in those markets, where, it is probable, much greater quantities of the inferior British goods continue to be sold than of the superior American manufacture. Now, sir, can it be for the interest of any body to introduce these inferior goods made from Bengal cotton? Can there be greater madness than that the cotton planter should be desirous to try this experiment? I have no doubt, however, that the manufacture of our coarse cottons will sustain itself eventually; but, if the other branches are prostrated, all the machinery will be turned upon this description of goods, and our own and foreign markets overstocked. So that, for a time, this branch will be paralyzed with the rest.

That, under a duty of twenty per cent., vast quantities of the finer descriptions of plain goods and printing cloths will be imported, there can be no doubt; but it is upon the branch of calico printing that it will fall with peculiar severity. So far as I am informed, there is but one opinion amongst those best acquainted with the subject, as to the effect of this bill—that it will cause an abandonment of the business. I believe it myself, and yet I have no hesitation in saying that, in all the branches of the cotton manufacture wanted for the common purposes of life, including printed calicoes, the United States are supplied by their own manufacture intrinsically cheaper than any nation on the face of the globe. It is very difficult to make a body, so much governed by theories as this House, understand how this can be true, and yet the manufacture be abandoned, in consequence of the introduction of goods which are actually dearer; but I appeal to practical men for the truth of it.

The fact is, the effect of the specific duty has been to establish the manufacture of goods of superior quality to most of the English, both as to substance, as to width, and as to permanency of colors. One-half, at least, of the British prints imported are fugitive colors, of no value, but which cannot be detected by the unskilful; while it is the custom of nearly or all the American printers to print nothing but in fast colors; at all events, the stamp of the manufacturer is a sufficient guaranty. Under the present duties, none but goods, comparatively high priced, are imported; but substitute an ad valorem duty of twenty or thirty per cent., and whole ship loads of miserable trash will inundate our markets. I have been farnished, and have before me, a sample which I believe to be the ne plus ultra of inanity; it is eighteen inches wide, and, I think, thirty yards would hardly weigh a pound. It is said to have been sold at six cents, subject to a drawback of four and three-eighths cents; and yet I believe the one and five-eighths cents which it cost the exporter is double its actual value.

The printing of cottons, in its present state, is one of the highest triumphs of human art; the engraving the cylinders is, perhaps, the most delicate and curious operation in mechanics; and the fixing the various colors is the application of the highest discoveries in chemical science. The transfer of such a business from one country to another is a work of extreme difficulty, and of great expense—it has been completed.

I boldly assert that there is no branch of the business, the designing, the engraving, the printing, or the raising the colors, which will not compare, in beauty and perfection, with the best work in Manchester. My constituents have invested several millions of dollars in this branch of business; they have done it under the sanction and faith of your laws; and you have no right to repeal those laws, and abandon that property to destruction.

Every dollar of capital belonging to my constituents, invested in the cotton manufacture, has been invested since 1816. They have never asked you for additional protection; on the contrary, in 1824, so far as individual opinion went, they doubted the expediency of the addition then made. The great fall of prices, in 1826, however, materially altered the state of the case; and the introduction of printing carried the business up into branches not originally contemplated. And yet, sir, we took no part in the additional duty of 1828. I was myself applied to, and asked if it was not expedient to petition Congress for further protection; I replied, that, as a question of policy, I might, perhaps, think further protection expedient, as extending the manufacture into higher branches, but being myself interested in the manufacture, I would not ask for it. It was not asked for by my constituents; they followed your legislation, and they claim the protection of those laws under which they have acted, as a matter of right. The only testimony taken, in relation to the business of printing, before the committee of Congress, in 1828, was that of Mr. Marshall, formerly of Manchester, then a printer of New York. He was asked the following question: "What is the difference in expense of printing the same patterns and qualities in this country or in England?" His answer was: "The expense of printing is one-third higher here than in England; this arises from the difference of expense in fuel, drugs, and wages; the fuel which costs twenty-seven dollars in Manchester, costs one hundred and twenty dollars in Hudson, to do the same business." And yet, sir, two gentlemen of the committee [Mr. GILMORE and Mr. POLK] have quoted evidence from that book, in reference to coarse cottons, as justifying their report, and forgotten to refer to this testimony of Mr. Marshall, which is directly to the point.

Now, sir, in the lower priced prints, where the foreign article is excluded, competition has brought down the prices to the lowest point of living profit, and, in the higher branches, where they meet the English, there is much uncertainty, arising from the nature of the business, where so much depends on fancy, and the relative supply. This description of goods has to be sold, whatever may be the price; the manufacturers never think of keeping them over.

In consequence of the large importation in 1831, and the increasing competition, a great many printing establishments have lost money during the last year. I have the accounts of the Merrimack company, made up for six months last November, showing a balance of profit of fifty-seven thousand dollars on the manufacture of three millions of yards, something less than four per cent. on the capital; but, in this account, no allowance is made for wear and tear of machinery, nor for insurance against fire. Now, sir, if such is the state of the business, under the present duty, can any thing but ruin follow under the present bill, which removes full three-fourths of that duty? There is one consideration of which I dare say this committee are not aware, and which has an important bearing on this question—the great outlay of capital, compared with the annual product. The great results in the cotton manufacture are produced by a great outlay of capital, which will only return in the finer branches an annual product of fifty to sixty cents for every dollar of capital. In other words, a capital of a million of dollars will only furnish an annual supply of five or six hundred thousand dollars of manufactures. So that twenty per cent. ad valorem on the products is only about ten per cent. on the capital.

In this respect, it differs materially from the woollen manufacture, where a given amount of capital will produce more than dollar for dollar in products. The effect is, that a duty of twenty per cent. on cottons is no more protection on the capital employed, than ten per cent. is on woollens. Why, sir, even England, with all her superiority, imposes as great a duty on printed cottons as that imposed by our present law. She imposes a duty of three and a half pence, or seven cents the square yard, in addition to an ad valorem duty of ten per cent.

Mr. Chairman: Aware how little this committee know of the state of this manufacture, I am going to furnish them the best possible evidence of the truth of my statements—the manufactures themselves. I have been furnished from a few different establishments with these samples, to which I invite the attention of the committee. It is, I dare say, such an exhibition as was never before made in this hall; it is, in my apprehension, an exhibition of which the country may well be proud. I take pride in being the organ of making it.

The distinguished son of South Carolina, who has lately taken a seat in the other branch of this Government, and who, with his friend, Mr. Lowndes, established the cotton minimum in 1816, was in Boston about the year 1818, at which time the Waltham factory was in full and successful operation. He visited that establishment, and was received with that sort of gratulation and triumph, which seemed to say, and which in fact did say—Behold here your work!

Mr. Chairman: I believe, in the enthusiasm of the moment, could it have been revealed to him, that, in the short space of fifteen years, such an exhibition as this could have here been made, and of which it might also be said, This, also, is your work! it would have given him a prouder, a nobler satisfaction, than a true revelation that it was his destiny one day to be the President of the United States. But, alas! what a change! Alas! Mr. Chairman, that in that band, who have conspired, and stand eager and impatient to strike the blow which is to lay this great interest prostrate at your feet, I should be obliged to say of that gentleman, El tu Brute?

Mr. Chairman: I cannot leave this subject without diverting to one other circumstance, which has an important bearing upon this whole matter. I stated, on a former occasion, that the depressed condition of the business of manufacture in England afforded an additional reason against withdrawing protection at the present time; that after a period of upwards of twenty years of unexampled prosperity, and of extraordinary profits and high labor, a crisis had arrived when over-production, and an excess of population in those departments, had entirely changed the scene; and that for several years neither capital had given any adequate income, nor the wages of labor afforded a decent support to the laborer. The period which I fixed on as this crisis, was the spring of 1826, when a period of six months of riots, of burning of cotton mills, and destruction of machinery, took place. There was a reduction in the price of manufactures of more than one-third in those six months, from which they have never recovered; on the contrary, they have generally continued to fall still lower. This fact will sufficiently account for the business of manufacturing being comparatively profitable from 1816 to 1824, under a moderate tariff, without its following at all that the same duty would be an adequate protection now. As this view is very important, I must beg to lay before the committee what must be considered, I think, full confirmation of it. It is the testimony of Mr. Atwood, a highly respectable banker of Birmingham, and a member of Parliament, before the committee of Parliament, appointed to consider the expediency of renewing the charter of the Bank of England. It may be observed that Mr. Atwood is, in one respect, a theorist. He witnessed the prosperity of England during the suspension of specie payments, and the change which took place on supplying the place of the small notes with gold, and attributes the change to that cause. I do not agree with him; but as to the fact of the general distress, there cannot be a better witness. The following is an extract from his examination:

"Has capital been invested in your neighborhood lately? Within the last five or six months, when the ironmasters and manufacturers generally are all going to ruin, and are in a state that I do not like to describe, because we all feel the painfulness of it, they are many of them still enlarging their works, not to partake of profit, but to prolong the path to ruin, by diminishing their general charges.

"In that case, of course, the depression of trade bears much heavier upon those who are not in a condition so to augment their works—much heavier.

"Must not that be one principal cause of the distress that prevails with you now, and is it not very much confined to that class of people? It is not confined; the distress is like the atmosphere, among all working classes and trading classes in England.

"Do you mean without exception? I say without exception, although I know that extreme difficulty exists in getting at this truth, for I myself feel great pain in stating it; but my opinion is, most decidedly, that all trade in England has, within the last seven years, been carried on at a positive loss, except where speculators have now and then made a profit.

"And you think that the effect of that distress has been to increase production? In some trades, unquestionably.

"How is that consistent with an answer you gave, that you thought that all consumption depended upon the increase of production, and that the increase of production would tend to the prosperity of the trade? The wages of labor of the unhappy laborers are paid at half the price; the consequence of which is, that, though they work sixteen hours a day in some trades, they do not get so great a reward in exchange as when they work twelve hours a day.

"Then you do not think that the increase of production alone will tend to the prosperity of the country? Not unless it is at high prices; it is the plenty of money that makes prosperity.

"Then a plenty of money, raising the profits of the people, is what you think is to increase the prosperity of the country? Unquestionably, I believe nothing else will do; I mean by that, not a wild increase of money, but such an increase of money as will be sufficient to raise the prices of property and labor above the level of the fixed charges which the law and the habits of the country impose upon production.

"Is the production of the country greater or less than it was seven years ago? In some instances it is greater, but in others it is less. It is greater, by the inordinate toils of some classes of men; and less, by the total want of employment, and the state of half employment of other classes of men.

"In the aggregate, should you say that it is greater or less? It is less. The aggregate productions, now, I consider are less than they have been for the last seven years.

"Do you think the aggregate capital employed in production is less than it was a few years ago? I think there is little or no capital employed in productive power now; the capital is annihilated, considered as money.

"Can there be production without capital employed in production? The capital is annihilated; it consists of brick and mortar, machinery and engines, which are almost worthless. I know one case of a cotton mill, which cost, seven years ago, thirty-five thousand pounds, that was sold by auction a fortnight ago for five thousand pounds.

"Is the food and raiment annihilated, with which the laborer is maintained? The capital I consider to be the buildings, and machinery, and dead stock, and implements and tools. I know a case, in Birmingham, of valuable tools and implements of a brass foundry, which cost, seven years ago, one thousand five hundred and sixty pounds, which sold a few weeks ago for one hundred and twenty-five pounds.

"Do you mean to say that the buildings and implements for producing the manufacture are not in existence? They are in existence, but they are worth almost nothing at all.

"Within what period do you consider that the capital invested in manufactures has been annihilated? In the last seven years.

"Has there been no fresh capital invested in manufactures? No, except in the manner I have described, in the desperate struggles of men trying to escape from ruin.

"You consider, then, that no capitalists have invested their capital in manufactories, with a view to productive returns within the last seven years? I am certain of it.

"Is there any increase in the cotton manufacture within the last seven years? The destruction of one man makes a rise of another. In some cases, in the cotton trade, immense mills have been sold, or let, for a fifth of their value; and out of that destruction, a new tradesman, coming in unshackled, sometimes contrives to exist, but not to make a profit.

"Does not a branch of manufacture sometimes establish itself in a new part of the country, to the very serious injury of property in places where it formerly existed? I have known nothing of that kind within the last seven years. I see every one shrinking from manufactures; every one that can draw out one-tenth part of his capital gradually does it, but I have seen no determination of capital into any trade within the last seven years; on the contrary, I have made it a point, within the last seven years, of asking the question, and I am sure I have asked it of a thousand well-informed tradesmen, whether they knew of any branch of industry existing in England, in which a prudent man of industrious habits, with ten thousand pounds in his pocket, and of competent knowledge, would be justified in embarking his capital; and I have never met with but one single instance in which that question has been answered in the affirmative, and that single instance was a Manchester gentleman; and when I came to cross-examine him, he broke down.

"You have stated that the fixed capital of the country is absolutely annihilated? Yes, I consider it so, as convertible into money.

"You have stated, also, that in many instances capital has changed hands? Capital which was worth one hundred thousand pounds has fallen in some cases down to five thousand pounds; that five thousand pounds gets into new hands, and enables the new man to carry on the machinery and the trade till another failure drives him to sell it for two thousand pounds; and so there seems no limit to the depression in progress.

JAN. 22, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

"When do you consider that process commenced of the destruction of capital? In the autumn of 1825. It commenced in the first place in 1816, and then it was changed in 1817 and 1818; then it commenced again in 1819, and went on till 1822; and then it changed again, and prosperity came till 1825."

Now, sir, this is the state of things against which our own manufacturers would have to contend on opening our ports at a small ad valorem duty. And in this conviction I cannot avoid making a short extract from the examination of Mr. Rothschild, the celebrated banker, before the same committee. I cannot but recommend the remarks of this practical man to the theoretical supporters of the system of free trade.

"If the exchanges be in the long run almost invariably in favor of this country, must not that be because there is a considerable balance owing from other countries to this? Yes.

"How do you consider that there is a considerable balance owing from other countries to this? Because England is the place of settlement for the whole world; what is wanting in India, in the Brazils, &c. gets settled here; and, secondly, suppose you import iron from Sweden, if you receive one thousand pounds worth of iron and manufacture it, you will then get ten thousand pounds for it, and then, when it is manufactured, it is sent to all the world. Suppose you get cotton from America, the cotton costs there three pence or six pence a pound; but when it is manufactured, that pound of cotton is worth four times as much. In the regular course of things, the exchange with every country must be in favor of this.

"If your opinion be true, that if there were no importation of corn into this country, and if there were no foreign loans wanted from this country, the exchanges would always be in favor of this country, must not it inevitably follow that all the gold and silver in the world must come to this country? It will tend to come here.

"Must not there be some counteracting check? Yes; if there was not, the world could not go on; if we had not sometimes importations of corn, and sometimes foreign loans wanted, I do not know how the people on the continent could live.

"You have taken into consideration the commodities that go out, but have you taken into consideration the wine and other articles brought here for consumption? If it were not for those things, I do not know what would become of the people abroad.

"Does not what you have stated prove that there is a gradual impoverishment of every other country in the world? I do not know that; because you must consider the quantity of gold we receive from the mining countries. We bought lately in Paris eight hundred thousand pounds sterling of gold, which came from the Dey of Algiers, that was locked up in his cellar, and did nobody any good.

"If other countries are not able to pay their debts to us, by sending to us the commodities they produce, but are obliged to send us gold, must they not be in a state of gradual impoverishment? Certainly; and what is the consequence? The result is, that we always make a loan when they get very poor; they always come for a loan of five or ten millions, or whatever they want."

Before I take my seat, Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say in reply to the honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means, from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK:] that gentleman informed us that the committee had fully examined into the matter, and that the bill would do the manufacturer ample justice; that its only effect would be to take away a part of the enormous profits which they were now making, and put them on a par with the rest of the community. I confess I was somewhat curious to see how this position was to be maintained; and I will not conceal my surprise, my utter astonishment, when he announced to us that the evidence was extracted from documents furnished to the Secretary of the Treasury, under a resolution of the last session of Congress, for the purpose of furnishing this House with information, now in the process of printing, and which the committee obtained from the printer of this House, partly in sheets and partly in manuscript, but none of which has been seen by a single member of this House. Yes, sir, it seems the manufacturers have been tried, and convicted in secret conclave, by the holy inquisition of this committee, by confessions extorted from themselves, and all this not only without being heard, but without being present! They have been convicted of making too much money. And, for this crime, this House is called on to perform execution. And the gentleman has actually chided us for the delay which made it necessary for him to state that there was any evidence at all in the case.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is that evidence? In the first place, he states that many of the agents declined answering the question, what were the profits? All these are condemned in mass for contumacy; "the inference is, therefore, most strongly drawn, that they could well bear a modification of duties, and still realize a fair profit." To be sure one agent gives the reasons assigned by many manufacturers, "as not willing to hazard an opinion on a subject they have not viewed in all its bearings." Another agent says, "they generally declined," or, "we make little or nothing." However, he says they have furnished evidence enough to condemn the whole body. And what is it? In the State of Vermont, Moulton and Cummins, in a woollen factory, make a profit of forty per cent. on twenty-two thousand dollars; J. Powers makes fifteen; N. B. Hazen makes twelve per cent.; an iron foundry yields fifty-four per cent. So much for woollens and iron!

Then, as to the cotton manufacturer, we have the following from one of the agents:

"It is well known that Maine has not many large manufacturing establishments of any kind. In that portion of the State which I visited or examined, I found but two cotton factories; one at Winthrop, in the county of Kennebeck, and the other at Gardiner, in the same county. The agent of the former very readily answered all the inquiries put to him, within his power to answer; the result of which will be found on sheet No. 1, accompanying this; but the directors of the Gardiner factory declined answering any of them, although twice called upon by me, and once written to on the subject. I, however, found, by inquiry, that their operations are about one-third more than those at Winthrop; and, owing to a favorable location and other facilities for carrying on their business, their profits must have been, during the year ending September last, fully twenty-five per cent." The agent guesses the profits at Gardiner must have been twenty-five per cent., because a factory at Winthrop made "about twenty per cent." Now, sir, I happen to know that the factory at Winthrop was sold, some years ago, by the corporation to whom it belonged, for a very small part of the cost; leaving large debts unpaid, and which remain unpaid to this day. The gentleman then displays manuscript documents: No. 150, fifteen per cent.; No. 149, twenty per cent.; No. 134, twenty-five per cent.; No. something, fifty per cent.; but, on being questioned to what business it related, it turns out to be saddlery. The gentleman proceeds, here are the returns; any gentleman can examine them for himself. And on such ex parte, imperfect, and anonymous testimony, we are called on, without an opportunity to examine it, to settle this most delicate question.

Most of the testimony quoted consists in the opinions of the agents appointed to collect facts; appointed to collect facts, they furnish opinions!

Mr. Bronson, of Connecticut, thinks the cotton manufacturers make use of a bad argument against the reduction of duty on cottons. Another agent answers an objection, which has been made, very satisfactorily to the gentleman from Tennessee. It is this: "The apprehension in which so many of the cotton manufacturers concur, that a foreign article, equal in appearance but inferior in quality with theirs, might compete successfully with theirs, appears to me [says the agent] quite groundless. Such an article would, in my opinion, find its market value controlled by quality."

And for such opinions the public money is paid. Sir, I will not waste time in answering such evidence or such opinions. I will only observe, that the period fixed on for making these returns, the year ending September, 1831, comprised a period of great overtrade, of high prices, of great profits, real or apparent, in every branch of business; it forms no criterion of the average, or subsequent state of things. I stated myself, at an early period of the last session, that, in some few cases, manufacturing profits had amounted to ten per cent. for six months; and yet the same establishments have made less than four per cent. for the last six months; in fact, a great part of the supposed profits of 1831 have proved mere moonshine, having been swept away by the numerous failures of 1832. I beg leave here to refer to a letter from a mercantile house in New York, of the highest respectability, which I presented to this House during the last session, in connexion with this topic.

I have a single word to say in reference to the questions propounded by the Secretary, as to profits, without expressing any opinion as to the propriety of the inquiry. I do say it is a matter of the utmost difficulty and delicacy to say what are the actual nett profits of a manufacturing establishment.

There is no rule that I know of, what allowance should be made for wear and tear and depreciation of machinery; it is a problem wholly unsettled. So much machinery is thrown out of use by new improvements, that there is a constant tendency to overrate the profits beyond the final result. I cannot state a stronger instance of this than in respect to the Waltham company; certainly, I suppose, the most profitable concern that has existed in the United States. They divided, for a series of years, about twelve or thirteen per cent. on the average; making what was considered a sufficient reserve for wear and tear, &c. And yet, in 1830, in making a critical valuation of their property, of their original capital of six hundred thousand dollars they could only find four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or seventy-five cents to the dollar.

Sir, some of the questions from the Treasury Department were of a character not easy to answer; for example: If a reduction of the tariff should cause you to abandon your business, how would you employ your capital? What is the average profit of money or capital in the United States? Who can answer this question? Certainly I cannot. So much depends on the security of the return. We know very well that four and a half per cent. stock of the United States would bring a premium. In trade or manufactures, I suppose ten per cent. would not be considered unreasonable. Gentlemen from Kentucky, Ohio, and Louisiana, tell me that any amount of money can be loaned in that region, on the best security, on bond and mortgage, at ten to twelve per cent. And gentlemen of the highest authority, from Louisiana, inform me that they will ensure twenty per cent. in cotton planting, so long as cotton will sell for ten cents a pound.

But the gentleman from Tennessee, after excepting against want of skill, borrowed capital, bad machinery, bad debts, fire and floods, lays down this proposition: "The general proposition which I affirm to be established by the whole body of this testimony, is, that in all those establishments where there is skill, real capital, improved machinery, and proper economy and vigilance in their management, they have proved to be more profitable than any other regular and steady business."

Now, sir, I join issue with the gentleman; I deny the fact in toto, and challenge him to make it good. Does he know better than the parties themselves? Sir, I have in my hand a statement made up by a gentleman, for whose correctness I can vouch, in the shape of an account current, showing the result of an original investment of fifty-one thousand dollars in the different establishments at Lowell, since 1821, and certainly no establishments stand higher, showing that, taking the price at which those stocks are selling, his return is something short of seven and a half per cent. per annum. The price of the stocks is in itself a very safe criterion; there are none worth par in the market. I have the last semi-annual returns of profits from the following companies: the Lowell, making negro cloths, capital four hundred thousand dollars; profits, between four and five per cent.; the Hamilton, capital nine hundred thousand dollars, barely four per cent.; the Merrimack company, capital one million five hundred thousand dollars, fifty-nine thousand dollars short of four per cent. As to the effect of this bill, which the gentleman considers so safe, I have only to state that the mere rumor that this bill might pass, caused a large quantity of the stock of the latter company to be sold at twenty per cent. discount. I have also in my hand a letter from Messrs. Lawrence & Stone, of Boston, owning one of the best conducted woollen establishments in the country, stating they had just made up their account for the year, having manufactured two hundred thousand dollars worth of cassimeres, and showing an actual loss of over four thousand dollars; and yet they did a very good business in 1831. I could multiply this evidence to any extent; but I trust I have satisfied the committee that this interest is, in fact, at this very moment, instead of being unusually profitable, very much depressed. As an evidence of the effect of our hasty tampering with this matter, I must beg to read the following extract of a letter from Lowell, a place of twelve thousand inhabitants, depending on the cotton manufacture, dated 13th January:

"Lowell is dull enough; no land speculations are going forward, and no prospects of new buildings yet being built. Several of the speculators and builders, who are without capital, (and this is the case with most,) have failed, and more must follow; no money can be hired now on real estate in Lowell, and rents, which have been very high, are coming down. As yet it so happens that every man who has failed, is of the true Jackson party; and the supporters of the President in this place are now pretty well satisfied, by woful experience, that he is not the great friend to protection which they have before insisted upon his being."

After all, Mr. Chairman, will this bill satisfy South Carolina? No sir, not at all. She has sworn by all the saints in the calendar, "that a protecting tariff shall no longer be enforced within the limits of South Carolina," and no human power shall drive her from her position. Does this bill extinguish the principle of protection? By no means. It will prostrate great interests, but it will not meet the position taken by South Carolina.

No friend of South Carolina would wish to see her satisfied with this bill. I have too much respect for her to believe she would be satisfied by it. What would be the inference, and what would be said by the world? South Carolina talked loud of principle, but she was only bragging high; her object was to get a little filthy lucre, and she was satisfied with it. I should be sorry to see South Carolina so disgraced. No doubt she must retrace her steps; she may do so with credit to herself; she may yield to the force of public opinion. I would give her time for reflection. So far as the real interests of South Carolina are concerned, I would save her from herself. I fully believe that the passage of this bill would lessen the value of her great staple of cotton nearly or quite a cent a pound.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I have satisfied myself, if not others, that we have no surplus revenue to reduce; that this bill is destructive, ruinous, unprincipled in its character; that its passage would alienate the affections of a great body of the people from the Government, and tend to disturb the peace and harmony of the Union.

[The above is Mr. A.'s entire speech as delivered on both days; but when he first obtained the floor, on Tuesday, he yielded to a motion for the rising of the committee, which was negatived by a majority of one vote, and Mr. A. thereupon commenced speaking.]

He had proceeded but a few minutes, when the motion was renewed, but again negatived: Yeas 72, nays 75.

Mr. A. had spoken for half an hour, in opposition to the bill, when the motion was once more made by Mr. E. EVERETT, and succeeded: Yeas 69, nays 63.

The committee accordingly rose.]

Mr. SPEIGHT then moved that the House do again go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He wished the people to see who were for deciding this question, and who were not.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. SPEIGHT demanded the yeas and nays; they were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 68, nays 76.

So the House refused to adjourn [at 20 minutes before 4 o'clock.]

Mr. SPEIGHT moved that the House do now go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. VINTON demanded a call of the House.

Mr. SPEIGHT asked the yeas and nays, and gave notice that he should do so whenever it should be moved to adjourn before 5 o'clock, until this bill should be disposed of.

Mr. STANBERY moved to adjourn.

Mr. SPEIGHT demanded the yeas and nays.

Tellers were called for, in order to ascertain whether one-fifth of the House demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas being 23, the nays 78, it appeared that no quorum had voted.

The CHAIR decided that the yeas and nays should be called.

Mr. MERCER appealed from this decision; but afterwards consented to withdraw his appeal.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 71, nays 75.

Mr. VERPLANCK said that at this time he feared it would be to no purpose to urge the House to proceed with the bill; but as the eyes of the nation were on the House, and an intense anxiety was felt through every part of the country on the result, he had been requested, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, earnestly to invite all who thought with them, as to the propriety of passing the bill, to come to the House to-morrow with a fixed determination of getting the bill out of committee if possible. He concluded by moving to adjourn, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. BURGESS, who admitted that great anxiety prevailed throughout the country as to the result to which Congress should come in respect to the bill: but observed, that there were many gentlemen in the House who wished and demanded to be heard before the bill should be taken out of the power of the committee; of these he was one.

Mr. WILDE said he was very anxious that the House should proceed; he would move to go again into committee, and if gentlemen were willing to listen to him, he would willingly commence his remarks at this hour.

Mr. POLK remonstrated with warmth against early adjournments while this bill was yet in committee: delay must be fatal to it: and if gentlemen agreed with him, he hoped they would come to-morrow determined to sit until the cock should crow on the following morning, if the bill could not sooner be gotten out of committee. Let gentlemen bring forward their amendments at once, and not consume the time in discussions on general principles.

Mr. EVERETT explained why he had at first moved for the rising of the committee. He had not done it in any vexatious spirit, but because, while his colleague [Mr. APPLETON] was making very important statements, on which he was founding a strong argument, the noise and confusion in the committee were so great that, although he sat within three feet of his colleague, he could not hear his words with sufficient distinctness to comprehend them. Numbers were just returning from another place where their minds had been much excited, [he was understood to allude to the Senate, where Mr. CALHOUN had been speaking,] and their entrance produced much of the disorder which had prevailed. It was not quite fair in the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] to press thus hard for a decision. The gentleman had himself made yesterday a very plausible speech, and one which, according to his own account of it, had made members flutter who were round him. And what had been the staple of that speech? Documents—to which none (or but one or two) of the members had had any opportunity of access. On these statements, he wished the House to go into immediate action on the bill. Mr. E. asked in the name of justice that these documents should first be laid (as far as they were printed) on the tables of members, that they might have at least the materials on which to form a judgment.

Mr. CARSON, after some remarks imperfectly heard, moved that the House adjourn.

The motion prevailed, and the House, at length, adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23.

MANUFACTURES, &c.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. ADAMS.

Mr. HOFFMAN proceeded to address the House, but was notified by the SPEAKER that the member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ADAMS said he had closed his remarks.

Mr. HOFFMAN then said he was not disposed to engage in a little counter debate on the subject of the tariff, when the main debate upon that important question was before the House in a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. A few of the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEWART] might, however, be supposed to require a word or two in reply.

The gentleman required a great deal of information. He [Mr. H.] was willing to give him as much as he could, and if he was not satisfied with that, it was out of his power to give him satisfaction. It appeared to him that if the gentleman could have recollected his vote and his predictions of ruin, he might have asked the House to rejudge the question. The gentleman said that he was in Egyptian darkness; perhaps he was, and subject also to other of the Egyptian plagues; but he wanted light. Mr. H. was sorry that it was not in his power to give the gentleman as much light as he wanted, but he would assist as far as he could. He wished for a reduction of the duties, because he wished to reduce the revenue six millions. He had the interest of the manufacturers at heart, and wished to encourage them as much as any one; but he wished the people to be disburdened. He wished to encourage industry, and would be glad to see all idleness converted into industry; and when he proposed to relieve the country of six millions of taxation, he believed himself to be acting as friendly a part to the country as those who wished to continue the taxes. So much for his answer, and for the reason why he would vote for the reduction of the taxes. At the last session the gentleman supposed that the bill of 1832 would not only produce enough for the revenue, but too much; a large sum in the public treasury, he looked upon as the greatest of human evils. He imagines the present bill to be unfortunate, inasmuch as it will not sufficiently reduce the revenue. He cannot say that it was unfortunate in not having the effect of reducing the taxation. The gentleman stated a scheme by which he could reduce the revenue without interfering with the manufacturing interest. He would not mind his scheme, but he would say that the present copper-washed pig iron system of taxation was the most cruel, the most oppressive, and the most impolitic that could be devised. When the people asked for a reduction of taxes, the gentleman would accommodate them by saying you shall have no relief; what you deemed burdensome shall be increased to you tenfold. This was such a system as ought only to be proposed by the worst of despots to slaves in the Asiatic world. He hoped the gentleman himself would repudiate and condemn it. He hoped never to see the Secretary of the Treasury adopt that system. No; the Secretary of the Treasury was an honest man, and would adopt no such thing. But, although he thought so badly of the scheme, yet the gentleman in Egyptian darkness thought highly of it. He would test his sincerity in a few articles. Would he adopt his system with regard to indigo? When he attempted to carry out this system on an article like that, he might have some credit for sincerity.

If Pennsylvania had procured for herself a sufficient quantity of railroad iron, to secure the completion of her great works, perhaps it would be as well for the gentleman to propose a duty on that article. The tax would certainly cease, if it went to prohibit the use of the article; and if the gentleman could get a duty of one or two hundred dollars a ton laid upon railroad iron, it would save all the duties on that article; but he would not recommend it, until a sufficiency of railroad iron was obtained to complete the works in Pennsylvania. So strong was the gentleman's opposition to the bill, that he was of opinion that the passing of it would create discontent and disturbance. Did any man believe that the people would take up arms, because their taxes were reduced? It would be a new era in history, if the people should be found to revolt against a reduction of revenue. He hoped Congress would exercise discretion and judgment, so as not to call forth confusion from a reduction of the public burden. The gentleman had said he wished for or recommended the imposition of taxes, because it caused a great reduction in the price of goods. He [Mr. H.] submitted to the gentleman and to the House, that the question was not whether the prices of goods had fallen or risen. The prices of goods depended on many circumstances, independent of taxation. Articles of importation changed their prices according to their value in foreign markets, according to the quantities imported and on hand, and from many other causes. The question was not, then, had the prices of goods risen or fallen; but, were the prices higher or lower than they would be without the tax? This might be ascertained by the difference between purchases made here and in other countries. In a document which was furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury in 1827, the gentleman might find a great deal of the information which he asked for. According to this statement among the ad valorem duties, he would find cloth of American manufacture at nearly double the price of foreign; and, in a great proportion of articles, the American prices kept from one-half to two-thirds in advance of European prices. At the other side of the water, the gentleman's system was better observed. There, the wants of the Government frequently rendered taxation sufficiently burdensome. Where goods were imported at ad valorem duties, the importer had an advantage on the price. He might have a variety of invoices, one by which to pay his duties, and sell according to another. In 1831, importations sold at handsome profits in the American market. Mr. H. then went into a comparative statement of the prices at which goods were purchased in the various markets of Europe, and said that those who had been purchasers in this country could say what the prices were in this market, and whether the prices of American manufactured articles were much below them. He submitted that the real question was whether the real prices were lower than they would be without the tax. He allowed that the prices in an importing country must be a little greater than in the country from which goods were imported. There must be the expense of transit, and a moderate, and sometimes an immoderate profit for the importer. He wanted something to reduce the prices; and the gentleman had said that the taxes reduced the prices. How? Mr. H. then went into a statement of the effects which the duties had on the prices of goods at different times. He would ask the gentleman to examine the returns of imported articles under ad valorem and specific duties. The real question was, were they lower here than they would be without a duty? No one would support a tax which could not reduce the prices of goods, but which might make them so high that they could not be purchased. He was averse to such a tax.

As soon as Mr. H. concluded his remarks, it was announced that the hour devoted to the consideration of resolutions had expired.

Mr. ADAMS wished that the question might be taken, at least on the first resolution, as early as possible. The information was of great importance as connected with the bill now pending in the committee of the House. He wished the House to understand that his resolutions had been before it about ten days, and had always been postponed in consequence of the hour expiring. During that time he had not detained the House, by any thing he had said, ten minutes. But if gentlemen would drive the House, Jehu like, into the consideration of the bill, without the information which the resolution was intended to afford, it seemed like a wish to prevent coming to a decision, which he deemed very important.

Mr. KENNON rose, but the hour allotted for morning business having expired, the House proceeded to the orders of the day, and again went into Committee of the Whole on the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. APPLETON resumed his speech, and concluded after addressing the committee, in opposition to the bill, about three hours.

Mr. EVERETT, of Vermont, followed. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means stated, yesterday, said Mr. E., that he was instructed (with what propriety, it belongs not to me to say) to request the Committee of the Whole to sit out the question to-day. This being the course indicated, I shall not make the motion, which at this hour (four o'clock) is usually sustained, that the committee rise; and I hope that motion will not be made by any opponent of the bill; though, should it come from the other side of the House, it would be accepted as a favor.

I do not rise, sir, for the purpose of delaying the progress of the bill; but to defend the interests of my constituents, which will be so deeply affected by its passage. I consider this bill not only as immediately injurious to their interests, but as tending to undermine, and ultimately to subvert the system of protection to the labor and industry of the country. The State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, at an early period adopted the system. Her representatives, against the rest of New England, (with the exception of New Hampshire,) voted for the tariff of 1816. They also voted for the tariffs of 1824 and 1828. From year to year, as often as the question has been in prospect, her Legislature has, by unanimous votes, requested her representatives to support the protecting system. Resolutions of that character, I have had the honor to present to the House during the present session. Such being the sentiments of my constituents, I cannot consent to permit this bill to progress further, without submitting to the committee my views of its principles and tendency.

I have said, sir, that my State is deeply interested in the fate of this bill. From the returns of the treasury agents, I am enabled to give a statement of those interests, approximating to accuracy. We have invested, in the various branches of manufactures, a fixed capital of $1,250,000, and an active capital of at least $1,750,000, yielding an annual product of over $2,250,000. We have in sheep the value of $3,000,000, requiring, in land, for their sustenance, the value of $10,000,000, yielding an annual product of $1,750,000. These interests are spread over the whole State; the manufacturers are located on every stream; the wool is the product of almost every farm. From this statement, it will be perceived that the leading interest is that of agriculture, the leading object, to protect the labor of the country, and, incidentally, the capital invested in manufactures. Those interests are mutually dependent on each other. It is in vain, sir, that we lay high duties on foreign wool, if we do not create a market for our own, by encouraging manufactures. On the other hand, we encourage manufactures, not for the mere profit of the capitalist, or of the manufacturers of foreign wool.

The bill has two objects; the one, ostensible; the other, understood; to reduce the revenue; to allay the discontents of the South. The bill, in conformity with the President's message, proposes to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government. This reduction becomes necessary in consequence of the near approach of the extinguishment of the public debt. In this I most heartily concur; on this point there is no difference of opinion. I go further: I not only concur in the necessity of reducing the revenue to the expenditure, but will go as far as any one in reducing the amount of that expenditure; not only to the sum of $15,000,000 proposed by the committee, but to the sum of $12,000,000. This, I think, it is in the power of this House to do; I do not say at this time, but that it ought to be ultimately brought down to that sum. The object understood is, to allay the discontents of the South. At the last session, I had supposed both these objects would have been effected by the bill of the 14th of July.

Soon after my return, sir, I received a document from the treasury, stating that the bill of July would reduce the revenue (calculating on the basis of the importations of 1830) from $17,288,643 to $12,101,567. But from the calculations appended to the report of the committee, made on the basis of the imports of 1831, the revenue, instead of being reduced to $12,000,000, will be raised to over $19,000,000. What will be the true revenue of 1833, under the bill of 1832, is not, it seems, to be ascertained by mere figures.

In regard to the protection of manufactures, I will not now stop to inquire, with what research, with what labor, with what care, the bill of 1832 was matured by the appropriate committee, (the Committee on Manufactures,) nor with what zeal, with what ability, it was debated, and contested, inch by inch, article by article; nor refer to the repeated yeas and nays on the minute questions of a cent more or a cent less duty; nor to the large majority by which it was passed, including, I believe, a majority of the opponents of the protecting system. It is sufficient to say, it was then supposed that the reduction of protection was carried as far as could be done, "consistently with the safety of existing establishments."

That was a bill for revenue: it was not the object to raise more money than the expenditures of the Government required. In adjusting the duties, incidental protection only was given to manufactures. That is all that they have ever received under any tariff; it is all they now ask. Nor has the propriety, much less the constitutionality of granting it been denied until lately. Both principles were admitted in the late address from the Baltimore Free Trade Convention, attributed to (I believe reported by) the late Attorney General, Mr. Berrien.

I have been sadly disappointed in the anticipated operation of the bill of July. It seems, sir, to have effected neither of its objects. It is now taken for granted that it will not, in some years to come, reduce the revenue; and it has equally failed to allay the discontents of the South. How, as a measure of concession, of conciliation, has it been met? The President's late message has informed us.

Mr. Chairman, ought such a reception to have been expected? Were there no valuable concessions in that bill? Did the manufacturers yield nothing? Sir, I hold in my hand a statement of what the woollen interest alone gave up by that bill, cast on the importation of 1831.

Value of im-ports in 1831. Amount of duty reduced by act of 1832.

On wool, costing 8 cents per lb., and under, from 4 cents per lb. and 50 per cent. ad val. made duty free, 1,235,601 lbs. -	$54,363	$76,585
Duty on other wools reduced 10 per cent. ad val. 4,387,359 lbs.	1,234,516	123,452
On coarse woollens, costing 35 cents per square yard, and under, from 14 cents per square yard, (being an average duty of 54-45 per cent. ad val.) to 5 per cent. -	1,005,660	491,299
On coarse blankets, costing 75 cents each, and under, from 35 to 5 per cent. -	650,000	195,000
		894,336
On other blankets, from 38½ to 25 per cent. -	650,000	87,750
On flannels, baizes, &c. from 45 per cent. on a minimum of 50 cents, (being an average of say 66 per cent.) to 16 cents per square yard, being an average of 50 per cent. -	350,000	56,000
On all carpeting, an average of say 5 per cent. -	421,129	33,690
On all other woollens, from 45 per cent. on the minimum duties, to 50 per cent. ad val. -	5,893,023	uncertain.

The coarse woollens and coarse blankets are principally used for the clothing of Southern labor, and under the proposed reduction the importation would, probably, be doubled in 1833. Were these concessions, made by the woollen interest, of no value? I pass from this painful subject, for the present, to the consideration of the bill before us:

The report of the committee contains one sentiment, to which I most cordially assent, "that we are more exposed to suffer from uncertainty than even error in legislation;" and what is the commentary? Why, sir, when this bill appeared in the House, (22d December last,) that of July was scarce five and a half months old; it had never gone alone. But, sir, I do not, technically, question its legitimacy. It had other parents; it came from the Committee of Ways and Means. A bill, settling the policy of the Government, in regard to the protection of manufactures, from a committee, whose appropriate duties, I say it with great deference; whose appropriate duties are, in my judgment, far more limited. I do complain that this committee has, in this bill, undertaken to settle the great questions of policy relative to the protective system, internal improvements, and the public lands. I had supposed that these subjects were appropriate to other committees; that, through their agency, the questions of public policy were to be presented to the House, there to be settled; and that it was the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to provide the means, in accordance with the policy so settled. On another occasion, it seems to me, the committee recognised this rule of action. A few days since, they moved a reference of a subject to the Committee on the Public Lands, to settle a question of policy, before they could report an appropriation. But, sir, why do I complain? It is a case of a wrong without an injury; we should have fared no better had it come from another committee; possibly worse. And here I will take occasion to say, that never, since the organization of the Government, has so important an interest been left unprotected. I beg pardon of the honorable chairman, [Mr. ADAMS,] and the gentleman on my left, [Mr. CONDIOT.]

At an early stage, I believe at the first sitting of this committee, after the chairman had called our attention to the details of the bill, an honorable member of the committee [Mr. WILDS] remarked, "majorities vote, minorities talk." The words, though significant, were, I thought, of evil omen, to our interests, at least; and I regretted that we could not expect the aid of the talents of the majority in discussing the great principles involved in this bill. It seemed that we must take it, volens volens. In other countries the bow-string is applied by persons who do not talk. I am now, however, much gratified that the majority have, in some measure, changed their course.

The honorable chairman has called on the different sections of the country to come to the support of this bill. When he calls on New York and Pennsylvania, I trust he will call in vain; though I cannot but see that, without votes from those States, this bill cannot pass. And will they desert us now—they who, on former occasions, have led the van?

of 1828, - - - - -	- 27 to 6
And Pennsylvania, too, who on those occasions, voted,
in 1816, - - - - -	- 17 to 3
in 1824, - - - - -	- 21 to 1
in 1828, - - - - -	- 23 to 0

Pennsylvania, though not now the victim, is reserved for a future sacrifice. On recurring to the yea and nays, I think it will be found that the line of division was then drawn between the agricultural and commercial interests.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, proceed to examine the bill before us in relation To the reduction of the revenue;

To the protection of manufactures;
To the conciliation of the South.

The reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government:

What are those wants?

In what manner is the revenue to be reduced?

What are the wants of the Government? The committee estimate the ordinary expenditures of the Government for this and succeeding years, at $15,000,000. I can hardly make up my mind to question its correctness. If the Government say that this sum is all that is wanted, it is performing an ill office to prove that more is wanted. But, sir, this House, as a part of the Government, is bound to ascertain the wants of the Government, and not to shut their eyes to those that are inevitable, or even probable.

The report proposes to sell the bank stock for the purpose of paying the balance of the public debt. That I consider a mere question of profit and loss; unless, as has been remarked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] the date which history may give to its payment, should be taken into the account. As a question of profit and loss, the bank stocks pay us seven per cent. and our debt is at from three to five.

I pass by the unexpended balance of $5,000,000, as the explanations of the honorable chairman were to me entirely satisfactory.

The committee have not included in the estimate of expenditures the large amount of private claims now before the House, nominally from seven to ten millions of dollars. Ought not these claims to be adjusted before we put the means of paying them out of our hands?

There is another subject of future expenditure: I allude, sir, to the probable removal of the Indians from Georgia. It gives me great pleasure to have reason to hope that that controversy is about to be settled to the satisfaction of all parties.

Mr. Chairman, have the committee looked to the South as a source of expenditure? I sincerely hope that there will be no occasion of adding an item of that character to the amount.

There is one subject of expenditure which the committee have, so far as regards the interior, stricken from the account—internal improvement, as heretofore, and until lately, understood. On this subject, I have more than once presented to the House resolutions from the Legislature of Vermont. I consider internal improvements as intimately connected with the protective system; not as creating a necessity for duties, but as cheapening the price of every article of manufacture, by diminishing the cost of transportation. The expense of transportation to the interior is one of our heaviest taxes; in some sections, more than all others. Sir, I consider internal improvements as returning many times their cost, in the increased value of the country in which they are made; in the comforts, and, I may add, in the civilization of its inhabitants. A comparison of those sections of the country where they have been fully executed, with those where they have been refused, would afford matter for deep reflection. In addition to the direct benefits, I consider canals, railroads, rivers rendered navigable, not only as affording the greatest facilities to national defence, but as the great bond of union, which, uniting State with State, one section of the country with another, rendering them mutually dependent upon, and necessary to, each other, will consolidate the Union in interest, not in political powers, and, more than any other single cause, tend to render it perpetual.

I have a word to say to the seacoast friends of the limited doctrine of internal improvement. It is time we should understand each other. Do they suppose the interior States will long consent to the limitation of internal improvement, to lighthouses, breakwaters, harbors, navigable rivers below ports of delivery? We have no direct interest in them. If deserted by our old friends, shall we continue to support them, for the purpose of enabling commerce more effectually to discourage our manufactures? Tide water improvements must, in the end, sir, be carried by tide water votes.

If it be taken for granted that the sum of fifteen millions is all that is wanted, (and, in relation to the objects embraced in the estimate, it is certainly ample,) how is the reduction proposed to be made?

The estimate of the committee of the revenue under the act of 1832, based on the importation of 1831, is - $19,530,648

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

While that of the treasury on the importation of 1830 is only 12,101,567

A difference of only 7,429,081

The committee have taken neither, but have made their estimate on an average of the importations of six years, but years of great prosperity. If, sir, you destroy the ability to pay, you diminish the consumption; and as to the amount of revenue, much must depend on the effect of the laws in relation to our manufactures. If they are prostrated, you may have perhaps even an increased importation for a year or two, but thereafter it will diminish as the consumption decreases. The years of 1831 and 1832, it is understood, were years of excessive importation; the usual consequence will follow, a diminished importation, except of the protected articles, and no certain or very probable reliance can be placed on any of the estimates. The committee may find themselves as much at fault in their estimate, as the Treasury Department was in that of July.

The ostensible object of the bill being to reduce revenue, why have the committee thought proper to recommend new duties? This is said to be done from a motive of financial prudence altogether. The operation of the bill is, it seems, a subject of, more or less. But, sir, why could not this financial prudence have been as well exercised in abstaining from reducing the duties on wool and woollens to the same amount? It is, in fact, the laying these new taxes, that creates the supposed necessity of reducing the duties on these protected articles.

The reduction of duties on woollens amounts to $2,101,787

The duties laid on coffee and teas 1,232,741

On silks 622,284

The repeal of the duties on tea and coffee at the last session, was made on the ground that they were articles of general consumption, which inveterate habit had rendered necessities, as well to the poor as the rich. From what quarter had come any indication of a wish that these duties should be restored? From no quarter, sir; their repeal was one of the measures which gave great satisfaction in every part of the country. I will refer the committee to a piece of evidence from the State of Maine; it is on the very first page of this book, [returns of treasury agents, Doc. No. 308, now printing for the information of the House.] I read from a letter signed Asa Clap, addressed, under date 21st April, 1831, to the Secretary of the Treasury. "Among the many duties which have been oppressive, were reckoned salt, coffee, and tea, being all used by the poorer class. As the Government has rendered itself popular in the reduction of the two first articles, it is hoped they will in the latter also."

A word, sir, on the subject of raising the duty on silks. I readily admit they are a proper subject of revenue tax though an article of very general consumption, it is not one of the necessities of life. Poor and rich are relative terms; and, sir, in that relation, which pays the heaviest tax on silks, in proportion to property, to ability to pay? I am inclined to think that the rich do not consume, or pay duties on the article in proportion to what is paid by the poorer class. But, sir, the question is not now placed on the general policy of taxing silks, as an object of revenue: we are not seeking to increase the revenue; but the question is now put to us in another relation—Shall we increase the duties on silks, for the purpose of creating a necessity of reducing the duties on foreign wool and foreign woollens? That is the question; and, for one, I answer, that I will not agree to the exchange.

There is another subject of increasing importance, to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. The report counts on the receipts from the sales of the public lands, amounting hereafter to three millions of dollars, as a part of the permanent revenue; as one of the items in their "basis for a financial system for many years to come." The proceeds of those sales have, it is true, been heretofore considered as a part of the revenue of the country, and it would have been very proper to have retained them in the estimates, had no change of policy been indicated by the Chief Magistrate, in accordance with the manifest expression of public opinion. In his annual message, he says: "It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue," &c. Yet this recommendation notwithstanding, we are now called upon to pass a law which shall pledge the public lands as a permanent source of revenue. Who does not see that this recommendation of the President will, in some form, be carried into effect? It will be done in one of three ways: in the mode pointed out by the President, "sold to settlers, in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts;" or in the mode provided by the bill passed last year, (now pending in the Senate,) by dividing the proceeds among the States in the proportion of population; or, lastly, by a certain summary process, supposed to be founded on State sovereignty. I cannot but express the hope that this great question will be settled during the present session, by the passage of the bill referred to. The resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, laid on your table, indicate the course her Representatives will follow on this subject.

There is something, Mr. Chairman, in the policy of the Western States, populous as they now are, that I cannot comprehend—their desire to procure a reduction of the price of the public lands. Do the people of those States desire to reduce the value of their farms? And such must be its inevitable effect. One will decrease in the same ratio as the other. What was the effect of the reduction of the price from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents on real estate in Ohio? Sir, will not the West, will not the States of Indiana and Illinois, be forewarned, that the new States which, in a few years, will be formed west of the Mississippi, will be to them what they are now to Ohio. Can the political, (I use the word in its appropriate sense,) can the political consideration of the mere increase of population be put in the scale against the consequences I have pointed out?

But, sir, on their own ground, I put it to the West; they may lay aside the hope, entertained but by few, of acquiring the public lands in virtue of the sovereignty process—I now put it to them to say, if their object be to reduce the price of the public lands, will they be more likely to attain it, by making their proceeds a part of the permanent revenues of the Government, than by dividing them among the States? They have then to determine whether they shall probably ever have an offer of a division on terms more favorable to their interest.

There is another effect of this division of the proceeds of the public lands, on which I will say a word. If made with a view to its application to internal improvement, or if that be one of its objects, it will withdraw from the General Government, in a great measure, that disturbing question.

Though, sir, I duly appreciate the immediate value of the distribution to the States, to Vermont about 60,000 annually, yet there is another consideration, from which, in my opinion, it derives its chief consequence, its tendency to sustain the union of the States, by giving them an immediate interest in the common property of the nation; and of which they shall annually be reminded, "and for remaining years to come."

If, then, the proceeds of the public lands are ababstracted from the permanent revenue, there can be no occasion, at present, to reduce the imposts. We can safely wait till we have paid all our debts; we can wait till we can ascertain whether future expenditures will become necessary, from any of the sources I have indicated; and we shall learn something by experience of the operations of the act of the last session.

A single remark more on this part of the subject. As a mere question of finance, I would ask, why should this act take effect the present year? Is any reduction of revenue necessary for the year 1833?

The report states the amount of revenue, for 1833, under the bill of 1832, at	-	$19,530,648
Under the proposed bill	-	17,051,884

Proposed reduction for 1833	-	2,478,764
From this deduct the new taxes	-	1,855,025

And for this sum of 623,739 we are called on to reduce the revenue for the present year. I shall have occasion to recur to this subject again for another purpose. I shall, also, before I take my seat, state the principles on which, in my humble opinion, the revenues should be reduced.

But, sir, there is no occasion to reduce the revenue, even this sum of six hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars, the present year. The years 1831 and 1832 were years of excessive importation; according to the usual course of commerce, the importations of 1833 must be very considerably less, probably by twenty per cent.

Under the tariff of 1832, the duties on an equal importation to that of 1831 would be	-	$19,530,648
Deduct twenty per cent.	-	3,906,128

Leaving for the probable customs of 1833	15,624,520
--	------------

It is stated in the report, that "the sum necessary for the ordinary operation of the Government, providing liberally for an efficient civil, military, and naval service, including the pension system of former years, need not amount to more than" 13,000,000

To this, for the present year, must be added—

The semi-annual pensions, under the pension law of 1832, for 1st September, 1833	875,000
--	---------

Two years' arrears of pension, to the 1st March, 1833	3,500,000
---	-----------

Enlarging the expenses of our present Indian policy, custom-houses, public stores, &c. &c. as estimated in the report	1,000,000

But, sir, the amount of revenue that would accrue under the bill reported, must be considered as uncertain. It depends on contingencies. So far forth as this bill destroys our manufactures, it will increase importations of the protected articles for a year or two; but, as it tends to diminish our means of paying, it will soon diminish consumption, and of course diminish importations generally. My fear is that it will eventually reduce the revenue below the wants of the Government; and when new duties shall be necessary, it too plainly indicates the articles on which those duties will be laid—on the unprotected articles. I cannot but look upon the introduction of the new duties on the necessities of life, coffee and tea, as the entering wedge for the destruction of the protective system.

One other consideration against reducing the duties, I will merely suggest; it arises from the present belligerent state of Europe. The signs of the times indicate but too surely the approach of a general continental war. Will its operations be confined to the land? May they not reach our commerce on the ocean? And then, sir, what becomes of your revenue from the customs? Though we may not be parties to the war, can we escape being parties in the war? So long, then, as there is no necessity for an immediate reduction of duties, does not sound policy dictate that we should wait until our foreign relations are fully developed?

I come now to what I deem a more important question—the operation of this bill on the great agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country.

In manufactures alone is invested a capital of not less than two hundred millions of dollars, which connects itself with every branch of agriculture. The magnitude of the subjects, and the immense effects that are often produced by causes apparently trivial, should induce us carefully to examine the path we tread. But, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] following up the lead of the honorable chairman, has told us this is not the time to discuss the general principles of the bill; that its details should be first settled; that, by amendment, it may be made a new creature. Sir, with great deference, I think this would be beginning at the little end. How, and to what end, shall we offer amendments, unless we have some principle, some settled object in view. One assumes that fair protection should be given to the great staples, and to the manufactures of the country; another, that it should be limited to articles essential to our safety in time of war; a third, that the duties should be laid equally on protected and unprotected articles. Each will shape his amendments to the object he has in view. With what hope of any beneficial result can we proceed in such a course? It seems to me that we should first settle the principle of protection—its objects—and then, and lastly, its extent. And further, perhaps this may be the only opportunity—the previous question may be applied.

I have had some difficulty in ascertaining, with any degree of precision, what are the principles of the Government, or rather of the administration, in relation to this subject of protection. I find others in the same uncertainty. In the message I find the following paragraph:

"The protection afforded, by existing laws, to any branch of the national industry, should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war."

These principles, if they were to be permanent, applicable to future as well as to the existing laws, would cover all the ground the most ultra tariff man could ask. To counteract the regulations of foreign nations, which, by high duties, virtually prohibit the great staples of a large portion of our country, our flour, beef, pork, fish, oil, lumber, &c., we might, by like duties, exclude their manufactures. Suppose cotton were added to the list of excluded articles; we should have no difficulties with the South. And should the British Government hereafter, to protect the products of its foreign possessions, impose such duties, or should any event prostrate the English manufactures, would not the South have some reason to regret her hostility to those of the North, and to rejoice that they had been sustained? I will not pursue the subject further. "Essential to our independence and safety in time of war," are words of extensive import. As heretofore construed by the Government, they include not merely munitions of war, but all articles essential to our comfort. I refer more particularly to Mr. Dallas's report on finance, of the year 1816.

In the same message is the following: "The policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war." The words, "indispensable to our safety," give rise to the all-important question, "What are those articles?" On the answer to this question depends my assent or dissent. Are they to be understood to be co-extensive with the former opinions of the Chief Magistrate, read by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNA], a few days since, and of which I avail myself? "Providence has filled our mountains and our plains with minerals—with lead, iron, and copper, and given us a climate and soil for the growing of hemp and wool—they being the great materials of our national defence, they ought to have extended to them adequate and fair protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in fair competition with those of Europe; and that we may have, within our own country, a supply of those leading and important articles so essential in war."—[Extract from General Jackson to Mr. Colman.] The sentiments contained in this extract will meet the entire approbation of the friends of the protective system. But, sir, we were told the other day that they were to be understood in a much more restricted sense; as including only munitions of war. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] seemed to speak ex cathedra. I hope he is mistaken.

Since the message, we have received the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Though he is not the official organ of the Executive, yet it is to be hoped that, on this occasion, he is in accord with the President. In this report I read: "This power [of laying duties] ought to be directly exerted; to counteract foreign legislation, injurious to our enterprise, and incidentally to protect our own industry, more especially those branches necessary to preserve, within ourselves, the means of national defence and independence." This seems to regard the future as well as existing laws, and seems not in perfect agreement with the last clause of the message. I next refer to the report of the committee, which accompanies the bill. The promised protection is only "in those instances where national independence, in the time of war, seemed to demand some sacrifice in peace, (as in the case of iron;) where it was thought a higher or a lower rate of duty would be of advantage to the revenue, without any individual injury, (as in regard to distilled spirits;) or where some branch of industry might be materially benefited by low imposts on some of its raw materials," (as, I presume, in the case of wool.) I now ask, what is the precise principle? what the extent of protection to be deduced from these sources? On this subject it is important that the public should be correctly informed. It is important to the North to know on what they have to depend; that they may in time prepare to meet whatever crisis awaits them. It is important to the South that they should know what they have to hope or to fear. A resolution, now on the table, should it pass, would, no doubt, elicit the so much desired explanation.

The report adopts, as a basis, the tariff of 1816. And why, sir? With what propriety? At that period our manufactures were in their infancy; they had grown up only under the protection afforded by embargo, non-intercourse, and war, from 1807 to 1815. The uncertainty of the duration of those restrictions had been unfavorable to the investment of capital; yet, to some extent, it had been induced to adventure in manufactures. Since the acts of 1816, 1824, and 1828, those investments have increased a hundred fold; not only in the then existing manufactures, but in various new branches, affording new objects of protection. How then it could be imagined that a tariff, suitable to the condition of the country in 1816, should be applicable to 1833, I cannot conceive. You might as well, sir, attempt to put the garment of an infant upon a giant.

But the committee have given us their reasons. I will examine them. First, that "the vast increase of manufactures, of all sorts, proves—(proves what?)—proves that the protection of the act of 1816 was ample." A non sequitur, sir. It proves no such thing. It proves that the adventurers in manufactures supposed it was sufficient; not that it was, in fact, sufficient. That is matter of fact which depends on evidence; and what is the evidence? The issue is, whether manufactures were, in 1824, sufficiently protected by the act of 1816. Whatever might have been the suppositions, the calculations, or the hopes of the manufacturers, they were, to their loss, mistaken! I now refer to the evidence contained in this book. It is a volume containing the manufacturing statistics of Maine and Massachusetts, collected by order of the treasury. I refer to a single statement. I find many more, however, of the same character. I read from the answers of Aaron Tufts, who, I understand from those who know him, sustains a high character for intelligence and integrity. I read it not only to disprove the conclusion of the report, but to show the real condition of manufactures from 1816 to 1832.

"It will not be in my power to answer but part of your questions, the principal object of which appears to be to ascertain, from facts elicited, whether the manufacturing business is so productive as to justify a reduction of the duties on the foreign article, and still leave the domestic protected. I can answer this general question as far as it respects the woollen business, and which will apply also to wool. I have been led to watch, with great attention, the progress of the woollen business from its commencement. I was a stockholder, for about one year, in the first factory which was put in operation in this country, in 1812; and having, from that time to the present, been the owner of a large flock of fine woolled sheep. This factory commenced business with a capital of thirty-one thousand dollars paid in, and invested, the whole of which was lost previous to 1818, and the factory passed into other hands. Other factories in this country went into operation at different periods previous to 1820, which, in almost every instance, have since become insolvent, or closed their concerns with a total loss. I will instance the woollen factory in Southbridge, which closed its concerns about three years since, with a loss, as I am informed, of one hundred and eighty thousand dollars. South Leicester Corporation, about the same time, met a loss of one hundred and ninety thousand dollars. Others might be enumerated, the situation of which would be no better. These factories were owned by gentlemen of abundant capital, well acquainted with mercantile business, and under the immediate direction of practical manufacturers. I am satisfied, from facts in my possession, that, in the woollen business, in the aggregate, previous and up to the year 1824, the loss would be equal to the whole amount of capital invested. The tariff of 1824 was considered a pledge given by Government, that protection should be afforded to the industry of the country; it held out some encouragement to the manufacturer, and induced many to embark in the business; a large amount of capital was invested. Some of those who had gone into operation previous to 1824, had survived in a languishing condition, and a part of those, after 1824, were ruined by the severe pressure of 1829.

"I do not believe that those who went into operation subsequent to 1824, have made a dollar in the aggregate, though there are some few instances where, by fortunate coincidence of circumstances, they have made six per centum or more; but these exceptions have been more from mercantile operations than the regular business of manufacturing. But few dividends have been made. The following statistical facts were obtained from the owners or agents of most of the woollen factories in this country, and were taken for the year 1831, and, it is believed, are very correct. They will go far to establish the opinions I have given in the foregoing remarks.

The whole amount, in value, of woollens made in this country in 1831, is - - - $2,499,500

Here, sir, are facts not to be done away by conclusions. A manufacturer who, between 1816 and 1824, had sunk his whole capital, would be content to be told that his adventure was ill-advised, but nothing short of the restoration of his capital will satisfy him that he has not lost it. I will not read further from this book to this point. With us, sir, it needs no corroboration. What we have suffered—what we feel, we know. And it would seem to me, the committee should have been led to doubt the correctness of their conclusion, from the fact that the manufacturers were then (1824) asking for further protection. I proceed to the second reason, hardly less satisfactory: "So well does it (the tariff of 1816) appear to have been adjusted in regard to woollens, that the manufacturers of these goods, examined by the Committee on Manufactures of this House, in 1828, generally agreed that their business was in a more flourishing state under the tariff of 1816 than under the higher protection of 1824." Ergo, the tariff of 1816 is a proper basis for protection in 1833. Unless this conclusion is drawn, the fact has no connexion with the argument. But the fact being true, does not prove that manufactures had sufficient protection under either the tariff of 1816 or of 1824; that, also, depended on matter of fact.

But, if they considered the tendency of high duties as injurious, why did they still ask to have them raised?

There were, Mr. Chairman, some things which deeply affected the interest of manufacturers, between 1824 and 1828, to which I ask the attention of this committee. I admit, with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] that one of these was the sudden rush of capital into the business of manufactures, without much skill or calculation. But, sir, this is one of the unavoidable effects of legislation; indirect, it is true, but not the less unavoidable. That cause, however, is not likely to occur again. This, however, was not the great cause of their distress at that period. Another cause affected them more deeply; the depression of prices in the European markets, produced, in part, by the competition between our manufactures and theirs. The same cause has been operating constantly since, and has reduced the price of some fabrics to the lowest cost of production.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the committee, in taking the tariff of 1816 as a basis, had not adopted its spirit rather than its form. That act was accompanied by a report from the then Secretary of the Treasury, which lays down a principle peculiarly applicable to the reduction of the revenue at this time.

"The American manufactures," says Mr. Dallas, "may be satisfactorily divided into three classes; allowing for such diversities of shades as will seem to render the classification of particular manufactures doubtful or arbitrary.

"First Class.—Manufactures which are firmly and permanently established, and which wholly, or almost wholly, supply the demand for domestic use and consumption.

"Second Class.—Manufactures which, being recently or partially established, do not, at present, supply the demand for domestic use and consumption; but which, with proper cultivation, are capable of being matured to the whole extent of the demand.

"Third Class.—Manufactures which are so slightly cultivated, as to leave the demand of the country wholly, or almost wholly, dependent on foreign sources of supply.

"The matured state of the first class of manufactures relieves the task of forming a tariff with respect to them from any important difficulty. Duties might be freely imposed upon the importation of similar articles, amounting wholly or nearly to a prohibition, without endangering a scarcity in the supply, while the competition among the domestic manufactures alone would sufficiently protect the consumer from exorbitant prices, graduating, generally, the rates of the market by the standard of fair profit upon the capital and labor employed. It is true, however, on the other hand, that, by imposing low duties upon the imported article, importation would be encouraged, and the revenue increased; but, without adding to the comfort, or deducting from the expense of the consumer, the consumption of the domestic manufacture would, in an equal degree, be diminished by that operation, and the manufacture itself might be entirely supplanted. It is, therefore, a question between the gain of the revenue and the loss of the manufacture, to be decided on principles of national policy. Under the circumstances of an abundant market, the interest of the consumer must stand indifferent, whether the price of any article be paid for the benefit of the manufacturer, or the importer. But a wise Government will surely deem it better to sacrifice a portion of its revenue, than sacrifice those institutions which private enterprise and wealth have connected with public prosperity and independence."

I shall have occasion again to recur to this report.

I now proceed to examine as to the time and manner of the reduction of the duties proposed.

In his message, the President recommends that the duties should be reduced "as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will permit." The Secretary of the Treasury recognises "the necessity of adapting the proposed changes to the safety of existing establishments, raised up under the auspices of past legislation," though he does not recognise that it is founded on the faith of the Government. He says, "it arises rather from a prudent regard to the rights and interests of the whole community, than from any absolute pledge of the national faith, uncontrolled by circumstances." And, further, he recommends the reduction "to take place" (not immediately, but) "after the year 1833." But, sir, all that can be found in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means that looks to the safety of existing establishments is, that, "to guard against a sudden fluctuation of the price of goods, whether in the hands of the merchant, the retailer, or the manufacturer," they have made the reduction upon the more important protected articles gradual and progressive. The principle of protection seems to have lost strength, gradually and progressively, as it has passed down, until, in the report of the committee, it is very nearly extinct.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, call the attention of the committee to the bill, for the purpose of seeing whether the reduction, as therein proposed, is consistent "with the safety of existing establishments."

This bill proposes to reduce the revenue (taking the importations of 1831 as the basis of calculation:)

For the year commencing 2d March, 1833,	$2,478,764
For the year commencing 2d March, 1834,	2,976,554
For the year commencing 2d March, 1835,	6,796,3

lens is, - - - - -	$2,584,017
And on cottons, - - - - -	2,812,862

It is obvious that this bill is directed against these two great branches of manufactures.

The proposed "gradual and progressive" reduction on wool is from about sixty-two per cent. (the average duty under the act of 1828, now in force,) to thirty-five per cent., commencing on the 2d March next; to twenty-five per cent. on the 2d March, 1834; and to fifteen per cent. on the 2d March, 1835. Thus, in less than fifty months, reducing the duty from sixty-two to fifteen per cent.; and this in the face of an importation, in the year 1831, of over four million three hundred thousand pounds of fine wool. Are the committee aware of the advantages against which we have to contend? the low price of lands, the low price of labor, and the immense European capital. If, sir, it is the policy of this country to reduce the price of our labor to that of the serfs of Europe, then this bill, I admit, is a very proper one to effect that purpose.

The proposed reduction on woollens is, from the minimum duties of 1828, equal, as protection, to an average of at least sixty-five per cent.; to forty per cent. on the 2d March next; to thirty per cent. on the 2d March, 1834; and to twenty per cent. on the 2d March, 1835; to twenty per cent. nominally, but, in fact, as protection, to only twelve and a half per cent., wool constituting one-half the value of the cloth; the twenty per cent. protection is charged with the duty on the wool, equal to seven and a half per cent.; which, deducted from the twenty per cent., leaves a nett protection of twelve and a half per cent. only—a protection not sufficient to guard against even the surplus importations of Europe. And, sir, can the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILMORE] be satisfied with this, though satisfied with the retained protection on iron?

I will here attempt to relieve the manufacturers from a dilemma, in which they are supposed by some to have been involved. They oppose the reduction of duties on protected articles, because it reduces their price. They advocate protecting duties for the same reason, that they reduce prices. This is said to be blowing hot and cold. Not so, sir; they contend for the one, as an immediate effect; for the other, as an ultimate effect. The fallacy consists in referring the effect of reducing and of increasing duties to the same point of time. Whoever contended that, if two merchants import goods on the same day, the one duty free, the other paying ten per cent., the former cannot undersell the latter by precisely the rate of duty; or that, if foreign goods are now imported at a profit, paying duties, if the duty was repealed, they might not be imported at the same profit, at a price precisely less than the duty? This, sir, is the immediate effect of a reduction of duties; but the ultimate price must depend on the relation between supply and demand. If a foreign nation alone afford the supply, we are daily liable to the fluctuations of her markets. If our demand increases, high prices are the only inducements to increase the supply. Suppose we had had no manufactures on this side the Atlantic, and our consumption had increased as it has since 1816, we must have paid more in high prices, than we now have paid for the protection of our manufactures. What has been the effect of our manufacturing establishments? To increase the supply in this country. Whatever has been manufactured here has excluded the same amount of British manufactures. The amount, thus excluded, is returned to her own markets, already fully supplied; the effect is to reduce the price of the whole stock in market. At these reduced prices, their manufactures again come in competition with ours, and ours in competition with each other. The prices are thus depressed in our markets: this, and our increasing the supply, again react on the foreign market, and this action and reaction continually operate, until prices are brought down to the lowest rate of profit on the cost of production. In the article of coarse cottons, this action and reaction have produced their ultimate effect. It is now admitted that we make that article as cheap as any foreign nation; that we export it, and are able successfully to compete with all the world in foreign markets. And this is the tendency of protection in all our manufactures.

We are then asked, in a tone of triumph, why do we object to a reduction of the duties on coarse cottons? I retort the question. Why reduce them? What good do you propose to gain? But I will not content myself with this retort. The sufficient answer is, that the manufacturers of coarse cottons have nothing to fear from fair trade; yet they have much to fear from the fluctuations of prices, which may be produced by the importation of the surpluses of foreign manufactures. Sir, a single fact will illustrate the case better than an argument. A shipment of white lead was made from England to Boston, with orders to sell at auction; the American article having stocked the market, the sale was stopped, and new orders asked; they came (and with another cargo,) to sell for the most they would bring—though greatly under the cost of manufacture. What is the explanation? Extensive manufacturers cannot stop their works, nor accommodate them precisely to the state of the market. In this case, there was an overstock of the English market; the surplus reduced the value of the whole; they would rather sell it at any price, than suffer it to remain in their own market. On the extreme of this principle, the Dutch destroyed their pepper.

The next inquiry is, whether agriculture and manufactures can bear this, or any reduction, without endangering their safety.

The question of reduction of protection was very carefully examined in this House, six months ago; and the reduction then made, as far as was deemed safe. What evidence has been afforded since that time? What new lights have the committee given us? During the present session, a resolution passed, requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to send us a comparative statement of the rates of duty under this bill and former acts, that we might know the full bearing of this bill. No answer has been returned. During the last year, the Secretary of the Treasury appointed agents to ascertain the state of the various branches of manufactures. The returns were made during the last session, and ordered to be printed. A day or two since, I obtained from the printer one volume, of only five hundred and seventy-six pages, containing the statistics of Maine and Massachusetts only, before referred to. These the House have had but little or no opportunity of examining. But, sir, so far as I have been able to examine them, they contain no evidence that would authorize the opinion that the duties could be safely reduced at this time; but much to show they were none too prosperous under the protection of 1828. How they would succeed under that of 1832, remains to be ascertained, unless we overleap it in the desperate plunge proposed by the committee. I shall have occasion to recur to this document. I will first, however, dispose of a piece of testimony introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK.] It is a tabular statement of the manufactures of Vermont, returned last season by a treasury agent. The gentleman read from the page "Windsor county" (in which I reside) the following:

H. or R.

The Tariff Bill.

[JAN. 23, 1833.]

	Fixed capital.	Active capital.	Profit 1831.	Profit for three last years.
Woollens.
Moulton & Cummins,	7,000	15,000	40	40
Sturtevant, -	3,500	5,467	33	33
Gookin, -	3,500	5,467	33	33
J. Downer, -	22,000	38,000	15	15
Cottons.
J. Lyman, -	25,000	20,300	21	21

And here, as to woollens and cottons, the gentleman stopped his reading. The impression which the committee received was, that this exhibited the state of the profits of the woollen and cotton manufactures in the State of Vermont; and the gentleman noticed the impression by the remark, that the statement "produced a fluttering." I confess in me it created emotions of surprise and of pleasure—surprise, that I had been so ill informed of the state of manufactures in Vermont—of pleasure, to find them in so prosperous a condition. Sir, with your leave, I will cross-examine the witness—the paper. And the first question is, has it testified to us the whole truth? Its answer is, no; it has only answered such questions as have been asked. On the very same page, under Windsor county, I read the following:

	Fixed capital.	Active capital.	Profit 1831.	Do. 3y'rs preceding.
Woollens.
N. B. Hazen, -	7,000	21,000	12	12
Kidder & Nichols, -	20,000	39,000	8	8
Perkinsville Co. -	30,000	38,000	4	4
On another page,
J. Sherwood, -	—	1,000	4	—
Cottons.
Marshall, -	60,000	40,000	6½	—
C. W. Root, -	2,000	3,000	5½	—
N. Wood, (wicking)	2,000	1,500	12½	6
H. Warren, -	36,000	21,000	7	7

This is the whole truth, on the paper.

I have a word to say, however, as to the first statement read by the gentleman. The cases of Sturtevant and Gookin are one factory, put in by each partner: this mistake appears on the face of the paper. This factory works not on its own account, but under a contract. Such is my belief. With the operations of the first (Moulton and Cummins) I am unacquainted. I hope its profits are not overrated. I should like, however, to see how the account is made up; whether the agency of the owners, loss by bad debts, insurance, wear and tear of machinery, &c. are taken into the account. I have inquired for the original statements, but have been unable to obtain them. In relation to the cotton factory, set to J. Lyman, within my knowledge it is all a mistake. In 1829 the factories of J. and E. Lyman were both (a large brick and a small wooden one) sold at auction, (the machinery all being taken out,) at 14 or 15,000 dollars, to J. Lyman. The brick factory was not in operation when this tabular statement was made—(May, 1832.) The wooden factory was put in operation under a lease in 1830 or 1831; and yet these are represented as having a capital of 45,000 dollars, and having netted a profit of 21 per cent. for the three years preceding 1831. Nor can I any better account for the general uniformity of the rate of profit of the last three years, contrary to the known fact. How this statement found its way into the paper, I am unable to say; but I will exculpate the person who signed it, the late Mr. Bayley, a man whose integrity no one ever questioned. He did not collect the evidence, but only collated it. From the result of this examination, I shall receive, and I think this committee ought to receive, with distrust, selected portions of evidence from these reports of the treasury agents.

The gentleman has hazarded, I think he used the word, has hazarded the opinion that the wool growers have not been benefited by the protecting duties; that the prices have not been raised by them. Sir, I wish, as he was using the paper as evidence, he had read the concluding paragraph of Mr. Bayley's report. I will read it: "The price at which wool has been sold has been greatly increased, and perhaps doubled, since the year 1828, and the increase of price is to be attributed chiefly to the tariff of that year."

I have examined this book, as far as I have had leisure to do, in part only, I have found nothing to warrant a reduction of duties at this time. I believe the average profits in the woollens for the last three years will not be found to have exceeded seven per cent., as stated by Mr. Tuft, nothing for 1829, fifteen per cent. for 1830, (a single profitable year,) and six for 1831. What they are entitled to is a fair permanent profit and no more; short of this they cannot be sustained, without pressing down the price of labor, and of the raw material, the fruit of labor. If the laborer will consent to reduce the price of his labor, and if the wool grower will consent to reduce the price of his wool, the manufacturer can consent to a reduction of protection; but whatever shall reduce the manufacturer below fair profit, must in the end be brought home to the laborer and the farmer. We are embarked in one inseparable interest.

Am I understood to say "that manufactures can bear no reduction of duties?" Sir, I should be very glad to know that they can. But what I mean to say is, that I have no evidence on which I can, at this time, act; and without such information, the stake is too large, the hazard too great. The interest involved in the wool growing and manufactures of wool cannot be less than 175,000,000 of dollars, extending throughout the Eastern, Middle, and Western States. Some of the consequences of breaking up this great interest, and manufactures generally, are faithfully described in the document before me, (No. 368.) "The effect is obvious to the most superficial inquirer. What must men do, when thrown out of employment? Seek a new one. Now every branch of business being stocked with laborers, recourse must be had to the land. A great many must be satisfied with what they can produce therefrom. Flax must be raised, and substituted for cotton: enough of wool must be raised for the consumption of each family; and no more will be wanted, as there will be no purchasers. They must make their own clothing, not having the means of purchasing, in consequence of being thrown out of employment. Notwithstanding cotton and woollen goods can be purchased for less than they can manufacture them, necessity will compel them to clothe themselves from their own productions. Real estate in seaport towns and villages would fall very much: in manufacturing villages it would be worth little or nothing. Trade would diminish generally to an extent little apprehended by those who have not examined this subject. And the shipping interest would suffer exceedingly. In proportion to the extent of breaking up manufacturing establishments, these effects would be felt."—(Letter of James Horton.)

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the examination of a feature in the bill more exceptionable than any one to which I have alluded, affecting immediately, and most fatally, in my opinion, not only the existence of the existing manufacturing establishments, but the whole commercial, and, indeed, every interest in the country.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

This bill proposes to reduce the duties on woollens ten per cent. from the tariff of 1832, (not yet in operation); but from the tariff of 1828, (now in force,) the reduction of protection will be more than twenty per cent.; and this to take effect on the 2d of March next—in less than forty days. What must be the immediate effect on the price of goods when this act shall go into operation? That will depend on the relative supply and demand at that time. British policy will induce an increased importation of woollens: this, with the excessive general importations of 1831-'32, must produce a pressure of the money market. What the immediate fall of price will be, cannot be calculated with certainty; but, suppose it to be only ten per cent., how will this affect the manufacturer? As a reduction of ten per cent. on the whole amount of his sales. The economical manufacturer turns his active capital from two to four times a year. Suppose, then, on a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, he is making a profit of twelve per cent., or twelve thousand dollars; if he turns his capital three times a year, to enable him to obtain this profit, his sales are three hundred thousand dollars annually. Strike off ten per cent. of all these sales, or thirty thousand dollars, and, instead of making a profit of twelve thousand dollars, he loses eighteen thousand dollars. If he turns his capital only twice a year, he loses eight thousand dollars. This would end the case with the manufacturers. But the evil will not stop there. The manufactures are connected with the moneyed institutions of the country. A vast business is done on credit. The relation of debtor and creditor now becomes of fearful import. Sir, what is the amount of that relation? Not less than one hundred millions of dollars, in which the manufacturers are a party; not less than five hundred millions of dollars, in which all the other interests are a party. How are the manufacturers to meet their responsibilities? By a sale of their manufactures at a loss at once of ten per cent. certain, and, when the pressure is at its height, at auction prices, where many are sellers and few are buyers. And yet this is but one side of the picture of distress. How are the merchants to meet the payments for the excessive importations of 1831-'32? Nothing more certainly follows than scarcity after plenty; than a press on the money market after years of excessive importation. How, I say, are these imports to be paid for? We have no public stocks, or bank stock to remit as formerly; the current on those scores sets the other way. The great Northern staples are prohibited; but there is cotton left. How is the North to pay for cotton? We must then first settle our exchange account; draw for all the balances due us. But this is now but a small affair. What is the next and only remittance? Specie. And what is the state of specie out of the vaults of the United States Bank? (and that, in the payment of the public debt, and remittance of its dividends of capital stock to Europe on winding up, will probably have enough of its own concerns on hand.) Take a single State. From the late returns of Massachusetts, it appears that it has a banking capital of twenty-four millions of dollars, and less than one million in specie. Are they better off elsewhere? What must be the result, when every dollar of debt shall require two of present value to pay it? An inability of debtors to meet their contracts to the banks, and an inability in the banks to meet their bills in specie. In this relation the whole mercantile interest, the whole relation of debtor and creditor throughout the country, becomes involved. Let the banks of one city stop specie payment, it will extend through all. Recollect the effect of the panic in 1828-'29, caused by merely calling for eight hundred thousand dollars for shipment. In 1825-'26, the failure of two or three large banking houses in London extended through England, Ireland, and Scotland, and occasioned the bankruptcy of over eighty banking houses, and more than fourteen hundred mercantile and manufacturing establishments. And then, sir, how is our reduced revenue to be collected? As in other times, in the depreciated currency of the different State banks.

One word more: Whether we lay or repeal duties, we have usually to indemnify the importers for the losses occasioned by our legislation. I would ask them if they should not now provide for their own safety. They will have, on the 2d of March, an immense amount of goods on hand, on which they will have paid, or be liable to pay, the duties of 1828 or of 1832, I do not know which. Let them now see to their rights, and not hereafter call on the Government to relieve them from injuries brought upon them by their own representatives.

I have thus far examined this bill in relation to its bearing on the revenue, and the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country; and I now proceed to consider it in the only light which presents, to my mind, the least possible apology for its passage—as a peace-offering to the South.

I approach this branch of the subject with no feeling of hostility to the South. I wish not to add fuel to the flame. I shall, therefore, forbear many remarks that might seem warranted by the occasion.

What, sir, are the complaints of South Carolina? What her demands? What the remedy she has chosen? What the effect of the passage of this bill? And what may be effected by other measures?—are questions now pressed upon our consideration.

South Carolina complains of our protecting tariffs, as unconstitutional, and as oppressive.

As unconstitutional. I consider this question as settled, if any constitutional question can be settled, by the uniform action of all branches of the Government, from 1789 to the present time.

As oppressive. This, sir, is a question of fact; and I ask for the evidence. Satisfy me that the South bears an unequal proportion of the public burdens; that she pays more than her portion of the taxes to the treasury, and she shall have my vote for relief. I am unwilling to take fine-spun theories for facts. I have never been able to understand the new principle of political economy, that duties on imports are a tax on exports, nor its application to the South. To me it has appeared certain that the tariff can prejudice the South in one of two ways only, by depreciating the value of their produce in its market, or by obliging them to pay a higher price for the articles they purchase with the proceeds. I do not understand that the first is contended: in some, and no inconsiderable degree, the reverse is the fact. So far as the consumption of her produce in the manufacturing States has increased the demand, it has increased the value. If they sell for as high a price, it would seem they can sustain no injury so long as the proceeds are retained in their hands. It must be, then, as consumers that they are injured, if injured at all. The first question is, do they consume more of the protected articles than other sections of the country? And the second is, are the prices of the protected articles higher now than they would have been had the protective system not been established? These, I repeat, are questions of fact, and, as such, I am willing to meet the evidence, and to abide the result. Let the account be taken; let us compare the expenditures of the North and the South; let us ascertain the effects of the protective system, of foreign and domestic competition; of domestic competition with itself; let us ascertain what is justice, and then, sir, in the language adopted by the honorable chairman, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] we will "be just and fear not." Justice was formerly painted blind, but, on the front of this capitol, the bandage is torn from her eyes. And why, sir, in this hall, should she be blind, or have only one eye, one ear? Why look only to the South? Why hear complaints from that quarter only? Why, in attempting to relieve one part of the Union, should she not turn to see the distress she may be inflicting on every other portion? And is this bill the measure of justice?

The Tariff Bill.

[JAN. 23, 1833.]

What does South Carolina demand? As a concession she will "consent that the same rate of duty may be imposed upon the protected articles that shall be imposed upon the unprotected, provided that no more revenue shall be raised than is necessary to meet the demands of the Government for constitutional purposes; and provided, also, that a duty, substantially uniform, be imposed on all foreign imports." And also, "provided we are met in due time, and in a becoming spirit, by the States interested in the protection of manufactures." Thus far, as concession. Of right, she demands that "the whole list of protected articles should be imported free of all duty; and that the revenue derived from import duties should be raised exclusively from the unprotected articles; or that, whenever a duty is imposed upon protected articles imported, an excise duty of the same rate should be imposed upon all similar articles manufactured in the United States."

I am unwilling to take any thing by concession. I am willing to do justice; but, sir, this offer of concession is accompanied by conditions. South Carolina retains to herself the right to determine the constitutionality of the purposes for which the money is raised, and her concessions are to be met in due time—the 1st of February, I suppose, and in a becoming spirit. I forbear to express the feelings which these conditions have excited; but, as a reply to the demands of South Carolina, I quote from the late message of the President: "The majority of the States and of the people will certainly not consent that the protecting duties shall be wholly abrogated, never to be re-enacted at any future time, or in any possible contingency."

As a remedy, South Carolina has resorted to nullification. She has declared our revenue laws void, and threatens, at every hazard, to maintain the ground she has taken.

The late proclamation and message of the President have relieved me from the necessity of discussing the doctrine of nullification. I leave it where the President has placed it.

In this state of things, the Committee of Ways and Means have presented this bill as an offering, a peace-offering, to nullification. Will it be accepted? It does not meet the demands of South Carolina. It contains, at least, the form of protection, certainly the substance as to iron. It does not come down to the required level of "an equal rate of duty on all imports." And South Carolina has taken her stand on that point, (but only on that, as a concession, and for the present,) her unalterable stand. "Our resolve is fixed and unalterable, that a protecting tariff shall no longer be enforced within the limits of South Carolina. We stand upon the principle of everlasting justice, and no human power shall drive us from our position." Can this act, then, be satisfactory as "a system of finance for many years to come?"

It has been said, not in this House, but elsewhere, that the passage of any law which shall repeal the tariffs of 1828 and 1832, would virtually repeal the ordinance of South Carolina. The first answer is, that this affords no argument for the passage of this bill. But, is this meeting or evading the difficulty? If we must meet the question, why not meet it now? Shall we ever be more united or better prepared? Is it seriously proposed to "ate (in law language) the ordinance of nullification by the passage of this bill? Is the question merely to be postponed until the convention shall meet and nullify another tariff? Then your course, to be consistent, would be, at the next session, to pass some other abating tariff, and a third nullification would follow. Having given up a part this year, we should feel less attachment to the little left. We could not stand, sir, the third process.

There is but one aspect in which the South can look at this bill with favor; that is, in view of the consequence to which it eventually may lead. They may calculate that, if they now break down the woollens, the woollens will join them in breaking down the iron interest; and that, with their aid, they can, and at no distant day, prostrate every remaining protected interest; and thus, by dividing, conquer. Is this the prospect, is this even the hope, that any friend of the protective system is willing to hold out to the South? Sir, let us not deceive them, let us not deceive ourselves.

Am I asked, then, "Will you yield nothing to conciliation?" I trust I duly appreciate the crisis; no one can more ardently wish to see harmony and good feeling pervade every portion of our country. No one feels a colder chill at the thought of the necessity of enforcing obedience at the point of the bayonet, or shedding the blood of a brother. In this spirit, then, I answer, I will yield every thing, I had almost said, but destruction.

Am I asked, "Will you not yield the principle of protection to the Union?" I answer, that I do not think the question is now presented by the state of the controversy. South Carolina, enfeebled by her own divisions, &c.; without the expected support from the neighboring States; the whole country almost unanimous, at least north of the Potomac, in support of the decided and energetic measures adopted by the Chief Magistrate; South Carolina alone against the Union! Sir, unless madness rules the hour, she will pause, reflect, and retrace her steps. I consider the Union safe, nullification as dead.

If, however, the question is still pressed, Will you not sacrifice the protecting system to union? All the answer I can now give is, that I will consult my constituents.

I have said that I would yield much to conciliation; and I will now point to a course which, in my opinion, ought to be satisfactory to the South; much more so than the passage of the present bill, if that, in the language of the report, is to be the "basis of a permanent system of finance for many years to come."

In the first place, let the expenditures of the Government be reduced, as far as is practicable and safe. For this purpose, let there be a thorough examination in every department of the Government. Let us, in the next place, ascertain the state of agriculture, manufactures and commerce, in every section of the Union, their extent and nett profit. We have collected a mass of statements, not yet laid before the House, that would be valuable; but I do not ask the House to act on the statements of persons in interest. If necessary, let a commissioner be appointed in each State, or, if you please, in every congressional district, authorized to take testimony on oath. When you have ascertained the wants of the Government, and the real condition of the country, you will be able to do justice, understandingly, to every section of the country. Is it not hazardous, is it not dangerous, is it any thing short of tampering with the great interests of the country, without such examination, without such evidence, to undertake to unsettle the policy of the country? We shall then be enabled to adjust a tariff to the condition of the country; and I should hope the great interest in the Northern, Middle, and Western States might be preserved without injury to the South. I will now, sir, suggest my views of the principles on which the tariff should then be reduced to the wants of the Government.

The first principle is contained in Mr. Dallas's report, to which I have already referred. It is this: that, on all articles which are wholly, or almost wholly, supplied by our manufactures, the duties should, in effect, be prohibition. I refer to that report for the reason—the consumer cannot be injured by it. The second principle would be to lay such duties on articles extensively manufactured in this country, as shall secure a fair and reasonable profit, and no more, for the purpose of enabling us to command all the necessities of life, which our country can produce, at all times; or, in other words, to render us independent of foreign nations. If we wish to be so in times of war, we must be so in times of peace. And, thirdly, with a view to this protection, we may admit, free of duty, all articles of general consumption which are not the product of our country.

If, on the adjustment of a tariff on these principles, it should be found to bear heavier on the consumption of one section of the country than another, such alterations must be made, from time to time, as shall do justice to all. In the act of 1832, the duties on articles principally consumed in the South were reduced by a large amount; and when the operation of the system is ascertained, other changes of the same character may be made. But suppose the necessity of a reduction of revenue at this time be admitted, it is somewhat strange that the committee had not adopted, as a basis, the tariff of the last session; and as the principle, a pro rata reduction: a basis and a principle far less exceptionable than any that could be taken from the tariff of 1816.

Sir, I cannot bring myself to believe that it is the desire or the interest of the South to destroy the great branches of Northern industry; that, in asking, they, in turn, will be willing to make some sacrifice; but, sir, justice, mutual justice, is all we ask, and it is all they have a right to claim.

I now again ask, is the bill before us the only plan of conciliation that can be offered, and accepted? And can we offer it in good faith as a system by which we can or will abide?

I again ask, which is best calculated to effect a permanent settlement of our difficulties, and to restore harmony to the country, this bill, or a settlement of the tariff on the principles I have suggested? To me, this bill seems, if not a wanton, at least an unaccepted, an unavailing sacrifice of the great interests of one section of the Union to the attitude of defiance assumed by another. In no point of view, can I recognise the necessity, the expediency, or the policy of its passage. I have, sir, said many things I did not intend to say, and I have omitted many things I intended to have said: but, though I have not exhausted the subject, I have exhausted myself.

Mr. WILDE next rose. He begged permission, before he proceeded, to correct a misapprehension which might naturally arise from an observation of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. APPELTON,] respecting himself. That gentleman had referred to the journals of the 14th Congress, to tax him [Mr. W.] with inconsistency, in voting against a proposition to reduce the duty on brown sugar from three and a half to two or two and a half cents. The price of the article was then from sixteen to nineteen cents, and the duty he voted for as a revenue duty was twenty per cent. The honorable gentleman could have found a more just and recent cause of complaint against him. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, at this very session, he had voted for reporting a bill, in which the same article, now valued at about five cents, was proposed to be charged with a duty of two cents, or forty per cent. His apology was to be found in his unwillingness, by sudden changes, to ruin large bodies of men, in his attachment to the union, the harmony, and the happiness of his whole country. Which was strongest, his love of peace, or the gentleman's love of justice? This sample of their fabrics would enable the committee to determine.

A short time since, he had urged the observance of a sound legislative rule—majorities vote, minorities talk. It might seem, as sometimes happens to better men than himself, there was some slight disagreement between precept and example. In reality it was not so. He had the ready justification of a politician's alibi—a change of circumstances. He had been in the majority, and he voted; he was in the minority, and he talked. Properly understood, and a proper understanding, was indispensable in all things. He was perfectly consistent. Yes, sir! said Mr. W., we were in a majority; it was not contested. We are in a minority. How does it happen? Has our majority thawed away under the melting breath of Executive pleasure? Has it been dispersed, like a nullifying mob, by the President's proclamation? Have we been routed by the Siamese twin-logic of the gentlemen from Connecticut, [Messrs. ELLSWORTH and HUNTINGTON,] or the more powerful lungs of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNA?'] The inquiry may not be wholly uninteresting to a portion of the people of the United States. If the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUNTINGTON] prevails, this bill is defeated. In the present temper of the committee, it must prevail. In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, we cannot have the yeas and nays. We cannot catch the eels in the gill-net; and as the people of the South will be unable to imagine why such concessions, as they thought were offered, should be refused, he felt it to be his duty to assist their inquiries.

He considered this, in effect, a proposition to continue the present tariff, for the purpose of carrying on the war against South Carolina. The merits of the controversy were best summed up by the pithy saying of an Eastern manufacturer: of what use is the Union without the tariff? and what good will the tariff do us without the Union? The proposition to the South, then, is this: "You shall pay taxes for the conquest of South Carolina." Now, sir, said Mr. W., I put it to your candor to say, if we are to fight for manufactures, whether the manufacturers ought not to pay the expenses of the war. So far as his voice went, they should do so. He would not vote a man a musket for any such purpose. But there was something still more extraordinary. The high tariff party of the North and East say they pay an equal, or greater portion of these taxes; and they only ask for the poor privilege of being allowed to tax themselves for the protection of their own industry! And so, sir, they mean to fight us for the right to tax themselves, and insist that, in justice, we must pay the cost of the campaign! Compared with this, Dr. Franklin's Frenchman, with his poker, was mild and reasonable. Mr. W. said he put this proposition, not to South Carolina—she had decided; but he put it to Virginia, to North Carolina. Who says she sleeps when liberty is in danger and Nathaniel Macon lives? He put it to Georgia, to Alabama, to Mississippi, to Tennessee, to Kentucky. All had an interest in the question; and he reminded all, "Tua res agitur paries cum proximus ardet." South Carolina says she will endure this system no longer. If you insist on ruining the concern by your dishonesty and extravagance, she asks leave to withdraw from the partnership. You say she shall stay and be ruined; and if she will not, you ask us to help you to blow her brains out! O, most holy Union, which must be preserved by cannon and bayonets! Happy republic! by the grace of God and gunpowder, one and indivisible! Shall we not head our bullets like revolutionary France, when, in an ecstasy of affection for all mankind, she proclaimed fraternity or death! May we not say with her poet, the keenness of whose epigrams nothing can equal, but the instrument which would have rewarded him had he been discovered,

"O, le bel age, quand l'homme dit a l'homme,
"Soyons freres! ou je t'assomme!"

He begged pardon of the House for his bad French; at least his bad pronunciation of it. If they knew under what circumstances his little knowledge of the language was acquired, they would excuse him. He would not venture to translate, mindful of the proverb,* but a free version, adapted to the times, might read,

* Traduttore, traditore.

"O, blessed age! when loving Senates vote,
"Let us be brothers! or I'll cut your throat!"

Ay, sir, redress is refused, secession is denied, oppression is continued, and the sword of the Federal Executive is to be flung into the scale of the Federal Judiciary! Discordant concord and perpetual union are proclaimed by sound of trumpet, and upon pain of death. Perpetual union! on such terms, it is the Dutch innkeeper's universal peace! When the amiable enthusiast, whose memory Paul and Virginia would preserve when his philanthropic visions were forgotten, published his proposal for pacifying the world, mine host seized on the idea for a new sign. It was inscribed, indeed, "A la paix universelle," but the design was—a churchyard! Such was not the peace of the peacemakers to whom the benediction was given. It was not the peace of God, or the peace of freedom; it was the peace of those described by Tacitus:

"Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant."

But it is said, what other course than coercion is left us? South Carolina has nullified all tariff laws, whether for revenue or protection. If we pass this bill, will she not nullify it also? Will it satisfy her? Mr. W. said he had no authority to speak for South Carolina. If he could say it would be satisfactory, he should be cautious of doing so. For that very reason it might be unsatisfactory to others. This was one of the instances in which Fontenelle's maxim applied; if you have your handful of truth, do not open more than your little finger. Thus much was certain. The bill by no means concedes all that Carolina claims as a matter of strict right; but it may present terms which, for the sake of harmony, she would accept. At all events, it suspends the operation of her ordinance, if we pass it. On this point there seemed to him to be an erroneous impression. Nothing could be clearer than, if any law passes, the convention must be called again; and in the mean time the law operates. If the law afforded even reasonable hope of a return to juster councils, could it be doubted that South Carolina would pause? Upon the passage of this bill, or one similar in principle, depended, he believed, the peace and integrity of the Union. If it was lost, he repeated, the people of the South should know how, why, and by whose fault it was lost. If the responsibility rested on their representatives, they would hold them to a strict account. If on others, they would learn to distinguish between real and pretended friends. How was the present measure brought forward? Mr. W. adverted to the President's message at the beginning of Congress, recommending, in strong and plain terms, a modification of the tariff. Has he, asked Mr. W., at any time advanced other opinions? Has he esoteric and exoteric doctrines? Was any gentleman authorized to say the President did not desire the passage of this bill, or at this time? He would yield the floor for such a sentiment. No. There was every indication that he desired it should pass; that it should pass at this session, speedily, at once.

Next in its official importance, on questions of revenue, was the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury. This was well known from his annual report, and his communications with the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Manufactures. He spoke of public and official transactions, not of conversations, secret or confidential. There were none such. If there had been, he trusted he knew better what was due to the sanctity of social intercourse, than to violate it voluntarily. Nor would his vanity, if he had been the depository of a State secret, the first, and, no doubt, the last, he would have been trusted with, have induced him to hint at the important and mysterious character of his charge. He spoke of matters open and avowed; of things authorized to be communicated, and, in fact, stated to the House by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, [Mr. HOFFMAN.] He was warranted, then, in saying that the bill had the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury; that it would give the necessary amount of revenue, without, in his opinion, leaving any inordinate excess, or destroying the manufacturers. The character of the Secretary was a guaranty that whatever he uttered he believed. He [Mr. W.] was no eulogist; but when he had occasion to speak of any man, he would do equal and exact justice. No; he retracted that expression; equal and exact justice was beyond the power of man. But he would do his friends a little less than what he thought justice, that he might not flatter them through partiality; and his adversaries somewhat more, that he might not censure them from prejudice. Whatever else the Secretary was, he did not want civil courage. On that floor, where Mr. W. had known him best, his opinions, right or wrong, were always boldly avowed and manfully defended. Had he changed since then? Would any one assert it? Was there any one there who would hazard the assertion that Louis McLane ever wore two faces, uttered a falsehood, or betrayed a friend? There could not be attributed to him, therefore, any more than to the President, two sets of opinions, private and public.

Who else was there, then, whose views of this matter could be supposed to exercise a material influence on the fate of the bill? The Vice President elect? Is not he, too, said to be in favor of the reduction of duties to the revenue standard? Is not he, too, desirous that a bill should pass for that purpose at this session? We have the strongest assurances that it is so. But the age is sceptical, and demands proofs. The position of this gentleman is in many respects critical and full of difficulties. Far be it from me to add to his embarrassment. But at this time, and on this subject, there can be no faltering. His past conduct in relation to it is not clear from ambiguity. The temptations that beset him are strong. What then? Truly, great men are ever greatest in the crisis of their fate. Noble and generous spirits rise with the danger, and are equal to the emergency. In this he is confidently affirmed to be with us; but I warn some of his friends who have been with us, but who are with us no longer, that the best evidence, perhaps the only evidence, which the South will accept of his sincerity, is their votes. To them, then, I appeal; to them I address myself. Of what use is it to speak to the high tariff men of the House? the opponents of the administration, and yet the advocates of coercion. Their choice is made, their sanguinary purpose uttered. To whom, then, but to our political friends shall we look in the day of trial? Where else shall we ask aid? where else can we find hope? To them I turn, not to exhort, I have no vocation; not to lecture, I am no professor; but to expostulate, as friend with friend. Until recently we stood in the same ranks, fighting the same battles, struggling against the same adversaries, acknowledging the same leaders. If they now waver in their faith or courage, may we not, without offence, entreat them to stand by us in this our last great danger? Is it not due to them, as well as to ourselves, that our thoughts of each other should be expressed frankly, but not bitterly? If we have come to the point at which we can no longer act together, without the violation of some duty, or the abandonment of some principle, let the fact be avowed and the motive admitted. Thus, and thus only, if we must separate, can both escape reproach, and hereafter neither can complain of being deserted or betrayed. I invite them, then, to examine the strength and weakness of their own position. The circumstances under which the bill came forward, had already been adverted to. All the auspices, whether of men or days, were happy; all the omens favorable. Who could be better fitted for a work of conciliation than his honorable friend from New York? [Mr. VERPLANCK.] Where could we look for so much zeal, tempered by so much prudence, and, above all, for sincerity unsullied by a doubt? The very sun shone forth upon his bill at the moment of its first reading; and, in its earlier stages, it was borne along by triumphant majorities, composed in part of the very gentlemen to whom I now especially address myself. By whom is this destructive motion made? By an avowed advocate of the high tariff and restrictive system; by an ardent opponent of the present administration; by a determined adversary of the favorite and leading politician of New York.

The Tariff Bill

By whom is it supported? By the most resolute and unwavering enemies of State rights, the doctrines of Jefferson, and the republican school of politics.

For what purpose? To destroy the bill. The object is not concealed; on the contrary, it is distinctly announced. When I said to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] the other day, that, according to his argument, the bill would not give us revenue enough, and his motion went to reduce it still more, he felt the force of the objection. What was his reply? "True, but the gentleman from Georgia must be aware that the motion, if successful, will be followed up by others to raise other duties, and thereby to get the increase of revenue required." In plain terms, tea and coffee must be made free, that wool and woollens and cottons may be subjected to prohibitive duties. The gentlemen to whom this appeal is made, hold the fate of the bill in their hands. If this motion succeeds and it will succeed if they support it, the bill is lost. Will they bear with me while I hazard some conjectures on the consequences? I have no gift of prophecy. I possess no powers, and employ no instruments, of divination, other than such as are common to every one of ordinary sagacity; but what will be, must spring from what is, just as what is must have proceeded from what has been. To transmute the past into the future, is the true alchymy of intellect. Let us see what we can extract from the alembick.

The first and least evil which may proceed from the defeat of this measure, if the blow comes from the quarter which threatens it, will be to throw the power of settling this vexed question into other hands. Is this an imaginary danger? What says the horoscope? Are there no starry influences; no impending planetary conjunction or opposition, boding evil to the great and little politicians of the North? May not Hesper regain the ascendant? In phrase less mystical, is it not a law of power that majorities divide, and minorities combine? If the North and East coalesce to support the principles of the proclamation, may not the South and West, to whom they are less acceptable and familiar, unite to resist them? And what can be fairer or more natural? If the giant and magician conspire, how can they be defeated but by nullification and Old Harry? Peace is a gift too precious to be rejected, come from what hands it may. The country must be saved, let who will save it. A civil war must be prevented, whoever is pacificator. The power is in the hands of my friends. It is the first wish of my heart that they should use it. I invoke them to do so. I entreat them by every motive of fellowship, of party, of patriotism, of humanity! But if they refuse; if their destiny is written; if even party spirit loses something of its influence by an unnatural alliance with reason and justice; still, I repeat, the country must be saved, and let the honor be his to whom the honor shall be due. Have our friends considered how they and their leaders, and their constituents, must feel in such a new coalition as their votes will throw them into? Once more I beseech them to pause, if the part they must take is not already fixed, the company they must keep already chosen. Once more I remind them, that, if they involve this country in a civil war, the administration, sooner or later, will have for its adversaries the whole South, its oldest and most steadfast friends, and for its new allies those who have pursued it with the bitterest ridicule and the deadliest enmity. Before they throw themselves into this false position, I invite them to review with me the arguments which are used to seduce them from their republican principles, their party attachments, and their Southern brethren.

We have heard that we must not submit to be bullied by a single State. We must not legislate with a sword over our heads. We will not be dictated to by South Carolina! Against listening to these miserable suggestions of false pride, we were cautioned by my friend from New York [Mr. VERPLANCK] in language so elegant and touching, that nothing can be taken from, nothing added to, without injury.

In family quarrels the best heads and hearts are ever ready to make the greatest allowance for errors of judgment and infirmities of temper. Stickling on points of ceremony, in such cases, is ridiculous. In entering into domestic broils, the etiquette is that fixed in other cases by old Frederick of Prussia, "the greatest fool goes first." But bad motives will be imputed to us. We shall be told to have yielded to our fears. And what course of conduct can we pursue, to which bad motives cannot be imputed? Bad motives have been imputed to me, Mr. Chairman, to you, and to every body else. Is that to be a reason for neglecting our duty? Then we must never do any thing. The very course gentlemen are pursuing to escape the imputation of bad motives, will expose them to that very imputation.

For example, an extract of a letter was pointed out to him the other day in a newspaper, which stated, "it is also said that Judge Marcy has written to the Van Buren members of Congress that they must stick to the existing tariff, and oppose any reduction of duties until Calhoun shall be so thoroughly down as to prevent all danger of his political resurrection. After that is done, it is intimated that something might be yielded to South Carolina."

Now he [Mr. W.] did not believe that Judge Marcy had ever written such a letter. He had too good an opinion of his prudence. He had no idea the Vice President elect had ever authorized any one to write such a letter. But the father-in-law of Judge Marcy is understood to exercise a great influence over the politics of New York, to have a very deep interest in wool, and to be utterly opposed to any reduction of duty on it. Judge Marcy and the Vice President elect are intimate and confidential friends. The world applies with little discrimination the maxim, "noscitur a sociis," and, putting all these things together, it is easy to impute bad motives, and to suppose that one man speaks the opinions of another. Now, the truth no doubt is, that the gentleman in question (Mr. Knowler) does entertain an opinion unfavorable to a modification of the tariff, at present. He may have expressed that opinion to his political friends as he has a perfect right to do. Neither Judge Marcy nor the Vice President elect are in the slightest degree responsible for it, and the opinion itself may be perfectly honest. Yet, after all, such is the uncharitableness of the world, that when men have a personal interest in maintaining certain very honest opinions, the honesty of such opinions is thought to be a scruple less than standard fineness. The popular notion of honesty was best expressed by a burlesque toast which he remembered. Some years ago, some one, he forgot at the moment who, had been toasted as "the man who dares be honest in the worst of times." A wag of Boston—where, by the bye, they manufacture the best toasts, if toasts are not their best manufacture—wrote a ludicrous account of an abolition festival, where Cæsar or Cuffy was thus made to travesty that sentiment: "De man; who dare be honest when he git nothin by him." That, sir, said Mr. W., is the only honesty which wins universal credence. A failure to observe it was the great mistake of a distinguished gentleman from the West, who, eight years ago, had occasion to give a vote in that House for President, and who afterwards became Secretary of State under the Presidency of the gentleman for whom he voted. In that vote the person giving and the person receiving it might be equally free from the slightest censure. Mr. W. believed they were so. Neither did he mean to be understood as saying that in consequence of that vote the gentleman referred to got any thing. He was not one of those who argue "post hoc, ergo, propter hoc." He had not joined the vulgar clamor: but that the fact of his taking office had been successfully though wrongfully appealed to as implicating the purity of his motives, admitted of no doubt. His honesty had been assailed, because it did not appear to be unprofitable. Who, then, can expect to escape censure if they profit by their honesty? He adverted to these things not to wound the feelings, and much less the reputation of any human being. For all the distinguished names of his country he cherished an habitual fondness. He felt he had an interest in them all as an American citizen. Whoever tarnished their lustre, robbed him of a portion of his birth-right. The matters he referred to were mentioned in no spirit of censoriousness or unkindness, but as topics of philosophical argument and speculation. They might serve to show gentlemen that the fear of having bad motives imputed to them, was no safe rule of action; for, in the instance alluded to, the distinguished citizen upon whom such motives were, no doubt truly, supposed to operate, was at first disposed to decline coming into the administration. But his friends persuaded him that such a refusal would be attributed to the timidity of an evil conscience, and their importunities exposed him, through the fear of danger, to the very danger they feared.

But, sir, continued Mr. W., if it were possible that any friend of the Vice President elect could entertain or inculcate such a course as the letter writer mentions, nothing could be at once more ignoble and more impolitic. Even Sylla saved his country before he chastised his enemies; and was one as much better than Sylla, as Sylla was greater than him, urged to remember his petty interests and animosities when the republic was in danger? Sir, the recent experience of the New York statesman's opponents might teach his friends this salutary lesson: Never seem to persecute a depressed adversary if you do not wish to raise him above you.

But it will be urged, no doubt, that the Vice President elect ought not to be identified with the gentlemen to whom these considerations were suggested, nor they with him: they were not his men, nor any one else's men; they were their own men, undoubtedly; he intimated nothing to the contrary; but, unhappily again, "circumstance, that unspiritual god," bore testimony against them, and, however hard it might be, the rule of political judgment was the rule of the prize court. Circumstantial evidence outweighed positive asseverations. The rule was harsh—oftentimes unjust; but it was the rule of the world, and the world alone could alter it. Unfortunately these gentlemen were all well known as partisans. He traced no gentleman through ayes and noes; but, unless his memory deceived him upon every test question of party, they were faithful to their colors far beyond himself. The Bank of the United States, the Choctaw reservations, the breach of privilege, the Wiscasset collector, all proved their perfect orthodoxy; and could they who subscribed the whole thirty-nine articles, boggle at the first question in the catechism? Where is party discipline more perfect than in New York? Have they not punished my friend [Mr. VERPLANCK] with the ostracism for a breach of it? And if all honorable duty is forbidden, ought he not to be proud of his punishment?

We have often been reminded of the power of the United States. To what purpose? Is the mere gift of strength a reason for using it? Can it make right, or legalize oppression? "Power without wisdom," says the poet, "is but armed injustice." Either he says truly, or we should apostrophize the sword with Devereux.*

"God, law, and priest, and prophet of the strong!"

Power enables its possessor to be magnanimous. The weak can never yield with so good a grace. Is the best part of the possession the only one we are never to use?

Besides, is the concession made to South Carolina alone? Are there not five or six other States which have suffered long, and who still entreat without threatening? What is the argument as to them? We cannot take off your burdens until we chastise South Carolina. May they not answer, very reasonably, relieve us first, and chastise her afterwards. But if you insist on chastising her first, and keeping on our burdens until it is effected, when are we to be relieved? A gentleman of much experience, who thinks South Carolina ought to be quelled, [Mr. ADAMS] is said to have estimated the cost of the conquest at ten millions, and the annual loss to the revenue during the operation, at three. When South Carolina is chastised, we who are invited to assist in correcting her, will find ourselves sharers in her punishment. Tea and coffee may continue free, but the duties on the protected articles will increase. Having warred for taxes, we shall pay taxes for the war.

But if we submit to one State, we must to another; first, one will nullify, and then a second; and if we yield to each of their demands, what is left of the Government will not be worth having; it will become contemptible from its weakness. The strength of Government is in the affection of its citizens. Was France ever stronger than in the days of the republic? Does history show any example of people rebelling against a Government which did not oppress them? Has South Carolina no cause of complaint? The whole South says she has. Seven States complain that they are oppressed. The President himself, in his message, admits the fact. Yet we must give them not redress, but chastisement, least, hereafter, other States should nullify without cause. A Government professing to be founded on reason desires to consolidate its empire by steel. It claims to derive all its just powers from the consent of the governed, yet seeks to eke out its authority by a little gentle force. Why and whence the revival of all this clamor for a strong Government? Is not the Government which lasted Thomas Jefferson through the embargo, and James Madison through the war, strong enough for any President? Do we not know the origin, the progress, and the defeat of that sect in politics whose favorite object it was to establish a strong Government? That sect the republicans of New York and Pennsylvania resisted, and at last overthrew. Are they about to be converted to the rejected heresy, more federal than federalism, ay, arch-federal? Let me avail myself of the authority of the great apostle of republicanism, he who wrote the political gospel of American independence. "A Government held together by the bands of reason only, requires much compromise of opinion; that things even salutary should not be crammed down the throats of dissenting brethren, especially when they may be put into a form to be swallowed; and that a great deal of indulgence is necessary to strengthen habits of harmony and fraternity." Sir, he was right, said Mr. W. Government, to use a comparison which would come home to the business of some of his Pennsylvania friends, Government is like iron, toughest when softest; if you harden it to make it stronger, it becomes brittle.

Even arbitrary monarchs find their best support in the affections of their subjects. There is but one way to make "taxation no tyranny." It is that recommended by old Burleigh to Elizabeth: "Win men's hearts, and you have their hands and their purses."

The violence and precipitation of South Carolina have been objected to. If she is wrong in her resistance to the tariff, however moderate she might be, she would be wrong still; if she be right, she will not cease to be right on account of her violence. One of the strongest political discourses he ever heard was delivered on that floor by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] from the text, "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." That speech had more effect than any one circumstance, except the battle of New Orleans, in making Andrew Jackson President of the United States.

Much has been said in the course of this debate about nullification. On that doctrine he had once expressed an opinion, of which he had nothing to retract, nothing to explain. Nullification could do little harm but for the help of the tariff. It reminded him of a saying which he would quote for the gentlemen from Connecticut [Messrs. ELLSWORTH and HUNTINGTON] who had quoted him: "The devil would not do so much mischief if it were not for the witches." The gentlemen had been pleased to extract from a certain letter of his such parts as they thought made in favor of their argument; and they referred to them with much praise, and some triumph. One advantage that letter at least procured him—some slight credit for candor and fair dealing, and a reputation for courage enough to tell the truth. But if he was a good witness for the East, he was for the South also. His testimony, if it was worth any thing, must be taken altogether. If it would be good to show the origin of the restrictive system, it would be good to prove the deeply-seated, all-pervading discontent of the Southern States. It would avail as testimony that union and the present protective duties are incompatible: we must choose between them.

The gentlemen from Connecticut [Messrs. HUNTINGTON and ELLSWORTH] had recommended to his attention parts of his own letter. There were other parts which he would recommend to theirs. If his memory served him, he had there said, too many would be found in every country to flatter and inflame the inclinations of whom or whatsoever may be sovereign; comparatively few to argue with the masters of votes or legions. For the reason, then, that if he were the representative of a manufacturing district, addressing at that crisis implicit believers in the beneficent magic of the restrictive policy, he should attempt to mitigate their zeal and confidence; for the same reason, appealing to those who were convinced of its malignant influence, it was his duty to soothe, if possible, their just indignation. Unless this course of conduct was pursued by all who aspired to be thought honest and dispassionate, must not alienations spread and become incurable? Do not the gentlemen from Connecticut, continued Mr. W., aspire to be thought honest and dispassionate? If they do, let them answer me this question: The gentlemen have praised, have they imitated me?

With respect to the character of the right to secede, and the circumstances and limitations under which it could be exercised, this was not the time to discuss them. He would say but a word. Unless there were instances in which a State could say to her associates, "Non in hæc fœdera venimus," disguise it as we will, this is a great consolidated Government; and if, for maintaining her construction of the compact through her courts and juries, she is to be sabred and bayoneted, it is a despotism.

Last session we were told, "If Carolina will go, let her go." We were told, "we could not drive her out of the Union." Now we must cut the throats of her citizens if she will not remain.

On this head, he could not avoid citing an apt passage from the declaration and protest drawn up by Mr. Jefferson, with the intention of being submitted to the Legislature of Virginia.†

"Whilst the General Assembly thus declares the rights retained by the States; rights which they have never yielded, and which this State will never voluntarily yield; they do not mean to raise the banner of disaffection or of separation from their sister States, coparties with themselves to this compact. They know and value too highly the blessings of their Union as to foreign nations and questions arising among themselves, to consider every infraction as to be met by actual resistance. They respect too affectionately the opinions of those possessing the same rights under the same instrument, to make every difference of construction a ground of immediate rupture. They would, indeed, consider such a rupture as among the greatest calamities which could befall them, but not the greatest. There is yet one greater: submission to a Government of unlimited powers. It is only when the hope of avoiding this shall become absolutely desperate, that further forbearance could not be indulged. Should a majority of the coparties, therefore, contrary to the expectation and hope of this assembly, prefer, at this time, acquiescence in these assumptions of power by the federal member of the Government, we will be patient, and suffer much under the confidence that time, ere it be too late, will prove to them also the bitter consequences in which that usurpation will involve us all. In the mean while, we will breast with them rather than separate from them every misfortune, save that only of living under a Government of unlimited powers."

A quarter of a century before, the patriarch had held similar language. "I thought something essentially necessary to be said in order to avoid the inference of acquiescence; that a resolution or declaration should be passed, 1st. Answering the reasonings of such of the States as have ventured into the field of reason, and that of the committee of Congress, taking some notice too of those States who have either not answered at all, or answered without reasoning; 2d. Making firm protestation against the precedent and principle, and reserving the right to make this palpable violation of the federal compact the ground of doing in future whatever we might now rightfully do, should repetitions of these and other violations of the compact render it expedient; 3d. Expressing, in affectionate and conciliatory language, our warm attachment to union with our sister States, and to the instrument and principles by which we are united; that we are willing to sacrifice to this every thing but the rights of self-government in those important points which we have never yielded, and in which alone we see liberty, safety, and happiness; that, not at all disposed to make every measure of error or of wrong a cause of scission, we are willing to look on with indulgence, and to wait with patience till those passions and delusions shall have passed over, which the Federal Government have artfully excited to cover its own abuses and conceal its designs, fully confident that the good sense of the American people, and their attachment to those very rights which we are now vindicating, will, before it shall be too late, rally with us around the true principles of our federal compact. This was only meant to give a general idea of the complexion and topics of such an instrument. Mr. M., who came as had been proposed, does not concur in the reservation proposed alone; and from this I recede readily, not only in deference to his judgment, but because, as we should never think of separation, but for repeated and enormous violations, so these, when they occur, will be cause enough of themselves."[‡]

A further development of these ideas was to be found in his letter to Mr. Giles, from which Mr. W. begged leave to read a couple of passages: "I see as you do, and with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the federal branch of our Government is advancing towards the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic, and that too by constructions which, if legitimate, leave no limits to their power. Take together the decisions of the Federal Court, the doctrines of the President, and the misconstructions of the constitutional compact acted on by the Legislature of the federal branch, and it is but too evident that the then ruling branches of that department are in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authority, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all functions, foreign and domestic. Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry, and that too the most depressed, and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all. * * * And what is our resource for the preservation of the constitution? Reason and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them. The representatives chosen by ourselves? They are joined in the combination, some from incorrect views of Government, some from corrupt ones, sufficient voting together to outnumber the sound parts, and with majorities of one, two, or three, bold enough to go forward in their defence. Are we, then, to stand to our arms? No; that must be the last resource, not to be thought of until larger and greater sufferings. If every infraction of a compact of so many parties is to be resisted at once as a dissolution of it, none can ever be formed which would last one year. We must have patience and longer endurance, then, with our brethren while under delusion; give them time for reflection and experience of consequences; keep ourselves in a situation to profit by the chapter of accidents; and separate from our companions only when the sole alternatives left are the dissolution of our union with them, or submission to a Government without limitation of powers."

The Tariff Bill.

If this bill fails, said Mr. W., I entreat our friends to consider what is the next step. If you will not alter, you must be called on to enforce. The choice is between this bill and another measure which must be nameless, not for want of words to characterize it as it deserves, but because they could not be used without a breach of order. He could not say what was doing in the other end of the capitol; but this he could say, he was present the other day at the consultation of a body of learned physicians: the case was one of delirium and debility brought on by ill treatment, and the remedy proposed was the lancet and blue pills. This is the prescription of our political empirics. The cry is, "Bleed the republic!" Let me tell them, sir, "Plus a medico quam a morbo periculi."

It no longer admits of a doubt, the choice of our friends must be made between coercion and conciliation. The first will soon identify Carolina with the whole South; the second will unite the South against Carolina. Coercion is not wise or prudent, nor always fortunate, even when the disparity of strength is greatest. Austria attempted to coerce the Swiss, Spain to coerce the Netherlands, England to coerce her North American colonies, and, in our day, Turkey to coerce Greece. What was the fate of coercion? There has, indeed, been one successful effort: Russia has coerced Poland. Is she proposed to us as an example?

In the struggle between the United States and a State, to keep peace vi et armis, by blowing up all malcontents, what is the alternative? If the State conquers, she is out of the Union of course. If you conquer, is she not out equally? You may reduce her to the condition of a subject province, you may reward with her plunder some proconsular Governor, for ruling her with the despotism of a master and the wastefulness of an agent, leaving behind you in her bosom—

"Immortale odium, et nunquam sanabile vulnus."

But she is a State no longer! You may grasp a barren sceptre, and wave it over a dispeopled territory; but till you exterminate the sons of Carolina, your dominion over her soil extends not beyond the points of your bayonets. And what will you have done? Extinguished one star of the constellation, and made South Carolina

"Like the lost Pleiad seen no more below."

Before gentlemen decide against conciliation, and in favor of civil war, will they review the history of our struggle with the mother country? If they will, and are not struck and warned by the coincidences, they are beyond the power of hellebore. Let me turn their attention to the page before me. It contains his Majesty's most gracious speech to both Houses of Parliament, on Wednesday, November 30, 1774.

"My lords and gentlemen: It gives me much concern, that I am obliged, at the opening of this Parliament, to inform you that a most daring spirit of resistance and disobedience to the law still unhappily prevails in the province of Massachusetts Bay, and has, in divers parts of it, broke forth in fresh violence of a very criminal nature. These proceedings have been countenanced and encouraged in other of my colonies, and unwarrantable attempts have been made to obstruct the commerce of this kingdom, by unlawful combinations. I have taken such measures, and given such orders, as I judged most proper and effectual for carrying into execution the laws which were passed in the last session of the late Parliament, for the protection and security of the commerce of my subjects, and for the restoring and preserving peace, order, and good government in the province of Massachusetts Bay; and you may depend upon my firm and steadfast resolution to withstand every attempt to weaken or impair the supreme authority of this Legislature over all the dominions of my Crown; the maintenance of which, I consider as essential to the dignity, the safety, and the welfare of the British empire; assuring myself, that, while I act upon these principles, I shall never fail to receive your assistance and support."

"My lords and gentlemen: Let me particularly recommend to you, at this time, to proceed with temper in your deliberations, and with unanimity in your resolutions. Let my people, in every part of my dominions, be taught, by your example, to have a due reverence for the laws, and a just sense of the blessings of our excellent constitution. They may be assured that, on my part, I have nothing so much at heart, as the real prosperity and lasting happiness of all my subjects."

Sir, said Mr. W., I intend to excite no additional odium against the memory of George III. In our declaration of independence he was indeed described as "a Prince, whose character was marked by every act which may define a tyrant." But he has gone to his account. His latter years it had pleased Providence to visit with the heaviest calamity that can befall a human being. With his shade, therefore, he warred not. There was probably some office form, a standard original, upon which all such instruments were made.

There was another curious coincidence which might become more or less perfect according to the exterior which was given to a contemplated call for certain papers. "An odd incident happened, which served to revive, with double force, all the ill temper and animosity that had long subsisted between the Executive part of the Government and the people, in the province of Massachusetts Bay. This was the accidental discovery and publication of a number of confidential letters, which had been written during the course of the unhappy disputes with the mother country, by the then Governor and deputy Governor of that colony, to persons in power and office in England. The letters contained a very unfavorable representation of the state of affairs, the temper and disposition of the people, and the views of their leaders, in that province; and tended to show not only the necessity of the most coercive measures, but even a very considerable change of the constitution, and system of government, was necessary to secure the obedience of the colony.

The Tariff Bill.

These letters, indeed, were in part confidential and private; but the people of the colony insisted that they were evidently intended to influence the conduct of Government, and must therefore be shown to such persons as had an interest in preserving their privileges. Upon the death of a gentleman, in whose possession these letters then happened to be, they, by some means which are not known, fell into the hands of the agent for the colony of Massachusetts Bay, who immediately transmitted them to the Assembly of that province, which was then sitting at Boston. The indignation and animosity which these letters excited on the one side, and the confusion on the other, neither need nor admit of description.*

How exact a companion piece would appear for this picture, if (which God forbid!) the correspondence of the Government with certain individuals in South Carolina should be published. He hoped it never would be. He deprecated that publication as fraught with infinite mischief. Other singular points of resemblance were to be found in the history of those times.

"The minister, after having moved that the King's message, of the 7th of March, should be read, opened his plan for the restoration of peace, order, justice, and commerce in the Massachusetts Bay." * * *

After stating his opinions, and arguing their correctness, the minister proceeded. "It would be proper, therefore, to take away from Boston the privilege of a port until his Majesty should be satisfied in these particulars, and publicly declare in council, on a proper certificate of the good behavior of the town, that he was so satisfied. Until this should happen, the custom-house officers, who were now not safe in Boston, or safe no longer than while they neglected their duty, should be removed to Salem, where they might exercise their functions."†

Upon these arguments, leave was given to bring in the celebrated Boston port bill, which will serve as a model for any Charleston port bill it may be necessary to prepare, and the reasons in opposition and support of which are so applicable, that gentlemen, by consulting the reports, may find their own speeches in those of Lord North, his partisans, or his opponents, with one exception, a little better English. Lord North, for example, is reported to have said, "I hope that this act will not, in any shape, require a military force to put it in execution. The rest of the colonies will not take fire at the proper punishment inflicted on those who have disobeyed your authority. We shall then be nearly in a situation that all lenient measures will be at an end, if they do. But, if we exert ourselves now with firmness and intrepidity, it is more likely they will submit to our authority. If the consequences of their not obeying this act are likely to produce rebellion, those consequences belong to them, and not to us; it is not what we have brought on, but what they alone have occasioned. We are only answerable that our measures are just and equitable. Let us continue to proceed with firmness, justice, and resolution, which, if pursued, will certainly produce that due obedience and respect to the laws of this country, and the security of the trade of its people, which I so ardently wish for."

We all know, said Mr. W., that the bill passed. If such a one comes to us, that coincidence, at least, will, I trust, be wanting.

After its passage, history informs us that several gentlemen who had voted for it were nevertheless of opinion that something of a conciliatory nature should attend this measure of severity, and might give greater efficacy to it. "That Parliament, whilst it resented the outrages of the American populace, ought not to be too willing to irritate the sober part of the colonies."

A motion was accordingly made for a repeal of the tea duty laid in 1767. The debate upon the policy of a repeal at that particular time, was long and earnest; the party for the repeal strongly urging experience, which they insisted was in their favor. That the attempt to tax America had inflamed, the repeal had quieted, and the new taxes had inflamed it again. The good effect of rigor would depend on a tincture of lenity. The lenity might render the rigor unnecessary. They, therefore, earnestly pressed the repeal of the noxious duty, as a probable method of restoring tranquillity. How were these arguments met? The ministry said, "a repeal at that time would show such a degree of wavering and inconsistency, as would defeat the good effects of the rigorous plan. That Parliament ought to show that it would relax none of its just rights, but enforce them in a practical way; that it was provided with means of compelling obedience when resisted. If this tax was repealed, what answer is to be given when they demand the repeal of the duty on wine?"‡

On these grounds the motion was negatived. After the Boston port bill, came the bill for the "better regulating government in the province of Massachusetts Bay." Both these memorable laws were before them. They were doubtless pattern acts for all lovers of strong government; but politicians, a little bolder than the British ministry, would put them together. He would not go through with them. Gentlemen curious in engines of coercion, might perhaps have scanned them clause by clause. In bringing forward that bill, Lord North favored the House of Commons with a dissertation on the posse comitatus.§ Then came the bill for the better administration of justice in Massachusetts Bay. That, too, would furnish some hints to an American Draco. They would be gathered up no doubt. It was on that bill that Colonel Barre was enabled to make his proud boast: "I resisted the violence of America at the hazard of my popularity there; I now resist your frenzy at the same risk here." It was then, too, he gave his memorable, but fruitless warning: "I know the vast superiority of your disciplined troops over the provincials: but beware how you supply the want of discipline by desperation."

Sir, said Mr. W., the fatal dilemma of Mr. Dunning is exactly that presented to the South: "Resist, and we will cut your throat; submit, and we will tax you."‡

From this hasty review of councils, whose folly and madness could be excelled only by our own, it was grateful to turn to a safer, a wiser precedent, that set by Thomas Jefferson respecting the repeal of the embargo. It would be unjust and imprudent to use any other than his own words: "Mr. Adams called on me pending the embargo, and, while endeavors were making to obtain its repeal, he made some apologies for the call, on the ground of our not being in the habit of confidential communications; but that that which he had then to make involved, too seriously, the interests of our country, not to overrule all other considerations with him, and make it his duty to reveal it to myself particularly. I assured him there was no occasion for any apology for his visit, that, on the contrary, his communications would be thankfully received, and would add a confirmation the more to my entire confidence in the rectitude and patriotism of his conduct and principles. He spoke then of the dissatisfaction of the eastern portion of our confederacy with the restraints of the embargo then existing, and their restlessness under it. That there was nothing which might not be attempted to rid themselves of it. That he had information, of the most unquestionable certainty, that certain citizens of the Eastern States (I think he named Massachusetts particularly) were in negotiation with agents of the British Government, the object of which was an agreement that the New England States should take no further part in the war then going on; that, without formally declaring their separation from the Union of the States, they should withdraw from all aid and obedience to them; that their navigation and commerce should be free from restraint and interruption by the British; that they should be considered and treated by them as neutrals, and as such might conduct themselves towards both parties, and, at the close of the war, be at liberty to rejoin the confederacy. He assured me that there was imminent danger; that the convention would take place; that the temptations were such as might debauch many from their fidelity to the Union; and that, to enable its friends to make head against it, the repeal of the embargo was absolutely necessary. I expressed a just sense of the merit of this information, and of the importance of the disclosure to the safety and even the salvation of our country: and however reluctant I was to abandon the measure, (a measure which, persevered in a little longer, we had subsequent and satisfactory assurance, would have effected its object completely,) from that moment, and influenced by that information, I saw the necessity of abandoning it; and, instead of effecting our purpose by this peaceful weapon, we must fight it out, or break the Union. I then recommended to my friends to yield to the necessity of a repeal of the embargo, and to endeavor to supply its place by the best substitute, in which they could procure a general concurrence."

Mr. W. was not unapprised, that, in some of these details, the memory of Mr. Jefferson was inaccurate. The correctness of the material part, however, remains unimpeached. The discontent of the East, and the machinations of some leading men there, to produce a dissolution of the Union, or temporary secession from it, had been communicated to Mr. Jefferson; and, instead of seeking means to punish the instigators of the resistance to a law of Congress, or asking new or extraordinary powers to enforce it, Mr. J. recommended a repeal of the embargo.

This much Mr. W. thought was apparent, even from the statement of the distinguished gentleman referred to, made with a view of correcting the errors of Mr. Jefferson's octogenarian memory. To avoid all injustice, Mr. W. would use his own language: "It was in these letters of 1808 and 1809," says Mr. Adams, "that I mentioned the design of certain leaders of the federal party to effect a dissolution of the Union, and the establishment of a northern confederacy.

This design had been formed in the winter of 1803-'4, immediately after, and as a consequence of the acquisition of Louisiana. Its justifying causes to those who entertained it were, that the annexation of Louisiana to the Union transcended the constitutional powers of the Government of the United States. That it formed in fact a new confederacy, to which the States united by the former compact were not bound to adhere. That it was oppressive to the interests, and destructive to the influence of the northern section of the confederacy; whose right and duty it therefore was to secede from the new body politic, and to constitute one of their own. This plan was so far matured, that the proposal had been made to an individual to permit himself, at the proper time, to be placed at the head of the military movements which it was foreseen would be necessary for carrying it into execution. In all this there was no overt act of treason. In the abstract theory of our Government, the obedience of the citizen is not due to an unconstitutional law. He may lawfully resist its execution. If a single individual undertakes this resistance, our constitutions, both of the United States and of each separate State, have provided a judiciary power, judges and juries, to decide between the individual and the legislative act which he has resisted as unconstitutional. But let us suppose the case that legislative acts of one or more States of this Union are passed, conflicting with acts of Congress, and commanding the resistance of their citizens against them, and what else can be the result but war, civil war? And is not that de facto a dissolution of the Union, so far as the resisting States are concerned? And what would be the condition of every citizen in the resisting States? Bound by the double duty of allegiance to the Union and to the State, he would be crushed between the upper and the nether millstone, with the performance of every civic duty converted into a crime, and guilty of treason, by every act of obedience to the law."

It was precisely this miserable state of things so clearly and ably delineated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that he [Mr. W.] desired to avoid. He conjured, nay, he implored, his political friends to aid him in averting it. If they turned a deaf ear to his prayers, he reminded them that the Southrons were Italians, not in their skies only. If they should trace up the failure of peace to those whose cause they had been upholding, there was danger they might adopt the desperate saying of Cosmo de Medici: "You shall read, said he, that we are commanded to forgive our enemies; but you will nowhere find we are required to forgive our friends."

Mr. W. wished to forgive all, or rather he wished, by a comprehensive measure of conciliation, so to bury every past cause of complaint, that there should be nothing left to forgive. In pursuit of that just object, he acknowledged no friend but him who aided, he recognised no enemy but those who obstructed it. Whosoever, in this hour of peril and dismay, would aid him in his holy purpose, whosoever would even dare to speak what the free-men of the country thought, but had not yet uttered, him would he grapple to his heart with hooks of steel! And he who thwarted him in this most cherished object of his life, would he tear thence, though he were his brother of the same womb, born at the same birth!

[Lights had been introduced before Mr. W. commenced, and, after speaking until nine o'clock, the committee rose, and the House adjourned. He finished his speech the next day, but it is given entire here.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24.

MR. ADAMS'S RESOLUTIONS.

The resolutions offered by Mr. ADAMS, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury, and on the President, for certain explanations as to parts of the Secretary's report and the President's message, having again come up for consideration,

Mr. HOFFMAN said: I did not intend to make this resolution the occasion of a counter debate to the tariff debate now in progress in committee. My colleague on the Committee on Manufactures, [Mr. ADAMS,] and myself, had differed respecting this call, and as he stated his reasons for it, I stated mine against it, and felt willing to submit the matter to the judgment of the House without further remark.

Mr. Adams's Resolutions.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has since stated that, by the etiquette of the House, it would have been improper for the committee to have made the proposed call on the President. I believe he is entirely correct in matters of etiquette, and I wish I could say the same of what he has stated in respect to my call on the Secretary of the Treasury. I did not call on him privately; I called on him as Secretary, and at his office, as I believe I had a perfect right to do; not to obtain a catalogue of the protected articles, but to know whether he approved of the bill reported, and what would be the probable delay or answer, if he would be required to give one, to the gentleman's resolution. I have reported his answer, and, if it be not acceptable to the gentleman, it is not my fault. The House know what the answer will be; and if it desires him to give his aid its judgment, it will make the call. I can only say, that highly as I respect his judgment, I do not think it can aid us much at this stage of the proceeding. If the gentleman persists in his motion, I shall ask that the question be taken on the last resolution, separately; and I do hope that the House, as well out of regard to its own character, as the courtesy due the Executive, will not request the President to inform us what articles are deemed essential to the defence of the country in time of war. The short answer would seem to be, arms and munitions of war.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEWART] wishes to know why I desire the repeal of the act of 1832. Why, sir, does that gentleman forget his very "ardent, zealous, and sincere" speech and vote against that act, and the dreadful ruin which he predicted would be consequent on its operation in practice? and can he find, in his very sincere opposition to it, no reason why I should desire that Congress should again review the subject, correct and improve that act, and rejudge its judgment? If he voted against that act because it reduced the taxes of the people six millions of dollars, could I not vote for it when I wished it to reduce those taxes double that amount?

The gentleman [Mr. S.] says he is in "Egyptian darkness," and calls for more light. I have none of "Morgan's Illustrations, or Giddings's Almanacks," and cannot enlighten him. From his argument, his action, and his vote, I cannot deny that he is in Egyptian darkness, and he may be afflicted with all the plagues of Egypt on this subject; but I will enlighten him as far as I am able.

The gentleman [Mr. S.] says that in 1828 I was the ardent and zealous advocate of the agriculturists. He will find me so still, and I hope by my acts to prove myself as sincere a friend to every branch of industry as the gentleman can be. And why should I not be? My habits or associations cannot tend to favor idleness. Indeed, I regard idleness as leading to corruption, and as pensioned on the labors of industry. Industry produces all and pays all; and I wish to relieve industry from the payment of six millions more of unnecessary taxes. Can it be good for the people to pay six millions of taxes not necessary to the support of the Government? Though he says he is in Egyptian darkness on the subject, I hope the gentleman may find some reason for my wish to relieve industry of these six millions of unnecessary taxes fastened on it by our present laws.

So much as to what the gentleman [Mr. S.] said about my reasons for desiring further to reduce these taxes. But he argued that the act of 1832 would produce an increased revenue, and, as well as I can understand him, that the present will produce a vast excess. One thing is certain, that the taxation on the articles is reduced, for the rate of the tax is diminished.

But what is his scheme for reducing the revenue? He would increase the rate of the tax so that the article could not be brought into the country. I mean no disrespect, and will apply no abusive epithet to the gentleman. I will treat him as a member of this House; but of his scheme, I will say, not that it is the Hong system of China, or the tory system of England, but that it is a copper-washed pig iron system of finance and protection; cruel, oppressive, and impolitic, in the extreme; fit only to be imposed on the most abject of slaves, by the worst of despots; wholly unsuited to a free people, and insupportable in a free country. What is it? The people ask that the taxation should be reduced, and the gentleman proposes to increase the taxes, and by a continued increase, until they arrive at a perfect prohibition. Such is his scheme. The people ask that the taxation should be reduced, and he proposes to increase the rate of taxation until the prices shall be so raised that they cannot obtain or afford to buy these necessities and comforts of life. He will give no relief, but increase these taxes tenfold; a system of Asiatic despotism, unfit to be countenanced in a free country; and on reviewing it, I hope the gentleman will repudiate and abandon a system so cruel and oppressive.

Yet the gentleman supposes that the Secretary of the Treasury might recommend his system of reducing revenue. But this is impossible. The Secretary is an honest man, and cannot recommend such insulting cruelty; he is an enlightened citizen, and cannot adopt such a system of absurdity; he is a friend to the industry of the country, and cannot recommend a system oppressive to, and destructive of all its energies. Does the gentleman really suppose that the Secretary could recommend Congress to adopt his system? He says so; and I am bound to believe him. He will give proof of his sincerity, if he will apply his system to indigo, which can be produced at the South. Let him move to extend his rule to this article under circumstances of probable success, and he will afford proof of his sincerity.

If Pennsylvania has by imports supplied herself, free of duty, with the iron necessary to the completion of her railways, and not without, for I am a friend to her, and do not wish to destroy them, let him, under circumstances which promise success, extend his system to railroad iron, by such an enormous duty as will prohibit its importation, and all will think him sincere. One or two hundred, or even fifty dollars tax on the ton, will work its exclusion, and force its production here. Indigo and railroad iron are fit articles on which to try his system of reducing revenue by increasing taxes on articles to be consumed by manufacturers, and those wealthy citizens who subscribe for railroad stocks. Let him fasten his system on these articles, and others like them, and none will doubt his sincerity. If tried on these articles, I think it would be found that increasing the rate of duty, even if extended to a prohibition, would be deemed by the consumers an increase of the tax.

The gentleman pushes his dislike of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, so far as to tell us that on its passage depends the peace, perhaps the continuance of the Union. Nullification must rejoice at this accession of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to its ranks. Has the gentleman considered the very awkward position in which he would place himself? We have often heard of a people driven into violence and resistance to taxes; but was it ever heard that a people resisted with force the reduction of their taxes? Whatever effect this bill may have upon the revenue, certain it is that it reduces the rate of taxation. It adopts lower rates of taxation than the act of July, 1832. Besides, sir, has the gentleman forgotten the proclamation, and his late adhesion to it? I hope he will not be so rash as to countenance civil confusion and violence, merely because Congress shall see fit to reduce the taxes of the people.

H. or R.]

Mr. Adams's Resolutions.

But the gentleman says he desires the resolution so amended as to require the Secretary to report the price of the protected articles before the tax was increased, and the price of the same articles since the increase of the duty on them. He tells us it will be found that the price of the article was higher before the increase of the duty, and lower after it; and contends, that such a report will prove that the increase of the duty makes the article cheap, and does not increase its price.

Now, sir, I submit that the gentleman does not state the true question. The question is not whether the price of the article is higher or lower before or after the increase of the duty, but whether the price of the article is lower with the tax, than it would be if the tax had not been imposed. This is the true question, and not whether it has risen or fallen since the tax was increased. For if the article be made of a foreign material, its price abroad, or though from a home product, yet its quantity and price here may increase the price of the manufactured article. So, too, though the tax be increased, yet the reduction of the price abroad may, notwithstanding the increase of the tax, permit the price to go down; and the greater cheapness of the raw material abroad and at home may, and would reduce the price here. The real question is not, therefore, as the gentleman states it, have the goods risen or fallen since the duty was increased; but are they dearer or cheaper than they would have been if the tax had not been increased? and the facts which approximate nearest in answer to this the true question will be found in the answer to the question, Since the duties have been increased to a reasonable protection, has the price of the protected articles been so low here as in other countries from which we might obtain them, allowing for the expense of importing them? Has the price of these articles gone down here, notwithstanding the tax, in the same degree that it has gone down in other countries? The answer to this question will show whether the tax has made the goods dearer or cheaper than they would be without the tax.

Now, sir, the answer to these questions will be found in the documents collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, under the order of the House, and sent to us at the last session, and ordered to be printed. In the House document No. 264, this information will be found in relation to goods paying an ad valorem duty, or amount of duty dependent on their value; and I will state a few of these prices for the information of the gentleman and the House. They will then be able to judge whether they have fallen here more than they have abroad, and whether they sell here as cheap as in other countries. According to this document, 4-4 cotton sheetings, which in England, in 1817, sold at 1s. 3d. sterling, can now be had at 4½d. a yard, and printed goods for ladies' dresses, costing then 36s. a piece, can be had for 18s. and 22s. "In 1816, a piece of common blue and white calico, 28 yards, in Manchester, 32s. sterling per piece, can now be had for 12s. to 15s. In woollens also a similar decline has taken place. Broadcloths costing, in 1817, 20s. can now be had for 12s. to 15s." And at page 6 it will be found that from 1816 to 1819,

Black do.	38s. do. $13½ to 14.
From 1819 to 1824,
Blue cloth in England, 38s. per yd. U. States,	$13½ to 14
Black do.	36s. do. 12½ to 14
From 1824 to 1828,
Blue cloth in England, 36s. per yard, U. States,	$13
Black do.	34s. do. 12 50
From 1828 to 1832,
Blue cloth, England, 28s. per yd. U. States,	$11 50 to 12
Black do.	26s. do. 11 to 11 50

From these prices it will be seen that in woollens the price here has been about double that in England for the same article; and that a great decline has taken place abroad in the articles subject to ad valorem duties; and every man who has any acquaintance with goods can say whether they have been made cheaper here by our protecting tax. In the document No. 308, I believe gentlemen will find more full and satisfactory evidence on this subject.

But, sir, as the importers of goods subject to ad valorem duty have an interest to put down the foreign price of their goods, I will call the attention of the gentleman [Mr. STRAWART] and the House to the price of goods subject to specific duties. In relation to these, the importer has no interest to put the foreign price too low; indeed, his interest is to place them on his invoice too high, as thus the invoice may be employed to help him to make a better sale, by showing it to his buyers. I will give the prices from the commercial statement of 1831, a document to which every member can refer. The commercial year ended with September, and it is known to all in the least conversant with trade, that during that year, up to October, not only the foreigner sold these goods to the importer at a fair profit, but also that the importer, after paying the duty and all the charges of importation, sold them in our market at a handsome profit.

Referring to this document, first session of the twenty-second Congress, vol. v, No. 230, it will be found that the foreign cost of the cotton bagging imported from Scotland was ten and a half cents the yard, and that imported from the Hanse Towns was six and a half cents a yard. Now this is one of our well protected articles; and I submit to all who purchased this article in our market, whether it was dearer or cheaper here than abroad. Of the Venitian and ingrain carpeting imported, that from Scotland cost there sixty-nine cents a yard, and that from England sixty-four cents a yard; and it will be easy for members to say whether it sold for more or less in our markets.

The sail duck imported from Russia cost abroad twenty-six and a half cents the yard; and gentlemen conversant with the purchase of the article for fitting out vessels can say whether the home article of as good quality sold as cheap.

Spirits from grain, imported from the Netherlands, Holland gin, I suppose, cost forty four cents a gallon spirits, from the Dutch West Indies, cost twenty-six cents, and from the British West Indies thirty-nine and a half cents the gallon. It is not difficult to say that no spirits of as good quality, distilled here, sold for these prices, though the protection, or tax on spirits, is abundant and of long standing.

The total of molasses imported was 17,085,878 gallons, and cost on the average, including the casks, as far as I can learn, $2,432,488, or fourteen and a half cents the gallon.

Of the imported sugars, I find that the brown, &c., pounds 98,576,928, cost $4,220,992, or four and a quarter cents per pound. White, clayed, &c. 10,437,726 pounds, cost $689,884, or six and six-tenths cents per pound.

We imported 2,108,165 pounds of lead, which cost $52,120, or about two and a half cents per pound; and this I find from the debates in the Commons of England, in 1830, on the application of the lead miners for an increase of the duty, was the Spanish price of lead. As the English have already exported 4 or 5,000 tons, it was found useless to attempt to increase the tax on an article, the price of which must depend on its worth for export. Does our protected lead sell as cheap here?

Other articles imported appear at equally reduced prices. Iron and steel wire, from England, at ten cents per pound. Nails, brought, I suppose, from England, at six cents per pound. Spikes, mostly from England, at 4 1-7th cents per pound. Cable chains, and parts of

Mr. Adams's Resolutions.

cables, 1,004,540 pounds, cost 51,341 dollars, or 5 1-10th cents a pound; and anchors, 54,771 pounds, cost 2,287 dollars, or 4 1/4 cents per pound; and members conversant in buying these articles for use, can easily determine whether the domestic sold for less here.

Saw-mill saws, 5,679, cost 16,160 dollars, or three dollars each, and every man in the country can judge whether protection has made them cheaper in this country. Sheet and hoop iron, from Russia, 6 1/2 cents per pound; and from England, 2 1/2 cents the pound; bar and bolt iron, rolled, from England, cost $1 58 per cwt.; hammered bar and bolt iron, from Russia, 12,720,534 pounds, cost 314,484 dollars, or 2 1/2 cents; from Sweden, 36,804,646 pounds, cost 880,907 dollars, or 24-10ths cents per pound; and that from England cost 2 3-10ths cents per pound.

The total of hemp imported, 51,909 cwt. cost 295,700 dollars, or $5 70 per cwt. I believe the article, or any of as good quality, sold here at double that price, and more. Salt imported from England cost 14 1/2 cents, and from the British West Indies 9 1/2 cents a bushel. Did the article of equal quality sell here as cheap? The average on the total of imported coal was 10 1/2 cents a bushel for the foreign cost.

I submit to the candor of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEWART,] and to the judgment of the House, did the home articles of equal quality sell as cheap here as these were sold abroad? And yet it is perfectly well known that the foreign manufacturer, in 1831, did a good and generally a profitable business. I know that there must and will be a difference in the prices of goods between their price in an exporting, and their price in an importing country. That difference must be the expense of importation and a profit: but if any of these are protected articles, which of them was as cheap here as they were abroad, adding the charges of importation, but not the tax?

And yet, sir, the promise has been, that they should be as cheap here as abroad; and this is the only solid ground on which the protecting system has or can be defended. The gentleman, to support his position, should show, not that the price has fallen since the duty was increased, for that may have been caused by the fall abroad, or the greater cheapness of the raw material; but he should prove that the fall here has kept pace with and outrun the fall abroad, and, in fact, that the price here is as cheap as in other countries. On examining the evidence of facts, and comparing the price here with the price of similar articles abroad, I believe it will be found that, if the price here has fallen, it has been preceded and caused by as great, and often a greater decline in the prices in other countries. Such surely was the case in 1828. For though the market here was overstocked, yet so far had the goods fallen abroad, that when our increased taxes of that year went into effect, the goods subjected to it could not be re-exported, with the drawback of the duty, and find a market abroad, without greater loss than was sustained by their sale here, with the heavy and increased taxes on them.

Mr. KENNON said that he did not consider the resolution as of great importance, and could not bring his mind to treat the subject with that great solemnity which some gentlemen might think becoming. He was against the resolutions, against the amendment offered by Mr. STEWART, against the speech by which both had been sustained, and also against the speech of Mr. HOFFMAN, by which both had been opposed. He was also against the decision given yesterday by the CHAIR, viz. that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had transcended the rules of the House, not that his decision was in itself incorrect, but because it might be that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had prepared a long speech on the tariff, and no other opportunity occurring, it might have done very well to stick it into the present debate. The House might have thus lost a vast deal of valuable information from the blacksmiths, hatters, tanners, farmers, and all other sorts of people in the gentleman's own district. He was against the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] because he had said that an inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEWART] had nothing in it; whereas it would be found that there was a great deal in it, when taken in connexion with the fact that the gentleman had voted against the bill of last year. He was opposed to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and to the doctrine involved in them. Did the gentleman really want information, for himself, as to what articles were necessary to this country in time of war? and, if he did, was that fact officially before the Executive? It was not. The President's information, as an individual, was possibly not better on this subject than that of his predecessor.

But it was not for facts that the gentleman was calling. He was calling for the President's opinions. These might be called for either by a friend or an enemy of the President: by his friend, with a view thereby to influence that House, or by his enemy, for the purpose of condemning and opposing it. Mr. K. was opposed to both, and therefore opposed the call. Suppose the President should have recommended the erection of a certain great seminary or college in the centre of the United States, with a suitable number of trustees, and the gentleman should call upon him to say whether he meant the geographical centre of the Union, or the centre of population; and where was the spot. And the President should reply that he meant the centre of population, and that centre was at the city of Cincinnati. The gentleman having got this answer, might immediately set to work to ridicule it, to show that the true centre was some miles from that spot.

The gentleman would next call on the President to say what he meant by a "suitable number" of trustees; and if the President should answer seven, then the gentleman would argue, probably, to show that this was ridiculous, and that twenty-four was the proper number. Now he was against all calls for purposes like these. But he was opposed to the resolutions, on another ground. The gentleman had sustained his resolution on the assumption that the reply of the President was to be received as pointing out those objects to which protection was ultimately to be restricted, and was, therefore, in effect, to decide on and guide the policy of the nation. If the President replied, and the position of the gentleman was true, he was taking the direct means of defeating the interests of his own constituents. If Mr. K. were now, or ever had been, unfriendly to the gentleman from Massachusetts, his desire would have been: Oh, that he might write a book; that that book might be a poem; and that poem be called "Dermot McMorrogh."

[Here the SPEAKER called Mr. K. to order.]

Mr. K. said he would not say what he had intended to say; but he could not consent to place any body in the situation this call was intended to put the Executive in. The President might answer the gentleman's call by saying that the objects he meant were food, clothing, and the munitions of war. Well, he must then be called on to go further, and say what sort of clothing he meant. The President might then say, perhaps, that he meant the coarsest kind of cloth. This would furnish a new ground of attack, and the gentleman might go on to show that the proper sort of cloth to clothe the army would be just that sort which was made by his constituents, and which enjoyed the highest protection. Calls of this description could produce no good, and must only lead to endless and unprofitable discussion. He therefore moved to lay the resolution on the table, but consented to withdraw the motion at the request of

Mr. STEWART, who said he was much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNON] for withdrawing his motion to lay the subject on the table, and he would return him his thanks for the grave lecture that he had undertaken to deliver to gentlemen on all sides with regard to the disorderly debate in which they had indulged; but he should be very sorry to follow his example in the cold, deliberate, unprovoked, and disorderly attack he had made on the venerable and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] which, however, he hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts would not condescend to notice. His object in rising was to offer an amendment; and since he was up, he would avail himself of the occasion to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] who, he understood from his friends, had made a severe and personal attack on himself in his absence. [The CHAIR said he had not done so.] Mr. S. said he was glad to be corrected, but when he came into the hall, the gentleman from New York was speaking of Egyptian darkness, and, he understood, he commiserated his situation. [Mr. HOFFMAN said he had not done so.] Mr. S. said he had said that, with regard to the gentleman's reasons for the sudden change his opinions had underwent on this subject, he was in Egyptian darkness, and the gentleman's remarks in explanation of his course had but rendered the "darkness more visible;" he had but mystified what he had attempted to explain. But some light had been shed upon this mysterious charge from another quarter. Some light had broken in on this point from the South. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDS] had very distinctly intimated that an opinion prevailed, that the friends of a distinguished individual in New York who had received the votes of the South for Vice President, [and among his friends was the gentleman from New York, Mr. HOFFMAN,] would not prove true to the understanding: that there was some shuffling in the ranks. The gentleman from Georgia had referred to letters from the Governor and other distinguished men in New York against the repeal of the tariff, and said nothing but the votes, ay, the votes, of gentlemen, could relieve them from this suspicion. Measures were to be given up for man. The party in the North were to repeal the tariff, and the party in the South were to go for their man. Now, if such a bargain existed, and it was not for him to say how it was, it ought to be fulfilled. If the gentleman from New York has sold out, he ought to comply; for a bargain is a bargain, whether it was justifiable in its nature or not; and if the gentleman, instead of mystifying, had said he had changed his course for this reason, by contract, he would have understood him. But the gentleman from Georgia had said that, instead of a repeal of the tariff, certain political doctors had concocted a dose of "cold steel, blue pills, and gunpowder," which was to be administered by the surgeon general to cure nullification. Reduction of the tariff had been tried as an anodyne; it had done no good; it had aggravated and increased the malady, and it had now arrived at a crisis. Desperate cases sometimes required desperate remedies; and as this prescription had been made by a doctor of their own choosing, they ought not to decline, however disagreeable, to take it: he thought it the only thing that could now effect a cure.

The gentleman from New York has said that I have joined the nullifiers; not so, as his votes and whole course would show he had merely warned the gentleman against the danger of disaffecting the sound portion of the community, by making them victims to the demands of those who never could be satisfied. The gentleman says, when the people require relief from taxation, I propose prohibition. The people! Who among the people had complained? What do they know of what is here going forward? Have they been consulted? No; but they and their interests, it seems, are to be traded and trafficked away by political gamblers. The gentleman says we ought to act promptly; that the eyes of the people are upon us. Yes, sir, they are; and he rejoiced that, from the recent developments to which he had referred, they might see more than the gentleman desired they might see—that their interests were here made the subject of political arrangement and traffic.

The gentleman has said that my system of protection is confined to iron: not so. Who was so blind as not to see that if Pennsylvania lent herself to the gentleman's plan of destroying the protection of every other interest, that the next hour the gentleman might turn round and propose the repeal of the duty on iron. Who was there to stand by Pennsylvania in support of this solitary interest? None—no, not one. She would be deserted, and she would deserve it. He, for one, was not thus to be seduced by so flimsy a contrivance.

The SPEAKER called Mr. S. to order: the bill was not under discussion.

Mr. S. proceeded: he was merely replying to the charges made against him by the gentleman from New York, who said that his system of protection was confined to iron; but since the Chair deemed it disorderly to reply to the gentleman, he would press this topic no further. He had confined his remarks strictly to a reply, and to the topics embraced by the resolutions. He had not advocated, as was alleged, prohibition; he had proposed, as the most certain means of reducing the revenue, and reducing the price of American manufactures, was to select those articles best adapted to the means and wants of our country, and to give them full and adequate protection, that the effect would be to attract capital and labor to these objects, and we would soon supply ourselves; and that whenever this was accomplished, the price would be reduced by competition, and the revenue would be entirely cut off by the non-importation of those articles from abroad. This was his proposition, and not to adopt, as the gentlemen had alleged, a system of prohibitions.

He would not extend his remarks. He would vote against the second resolution, calling on the President, for reasons already assigned: he would vote for the first resolution with the amendment he sent to the chair, as follows:

"Together with a statement showing the effect of the tariffs of 1824 and 1828 upon the prices of the foreign imports on which the highest rates of duty were imposed; whether the prices thereof, after the passage of said acts, were increased or diminished, and to what extent; also, whether the prices of articles on which the duties were reduced, have undergone a corresponding diminution."

Mr. S. then said that, in compliance with his promise to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KENNON,] he was bound to renew the gentleman's motion to lay the resolutions on the table; this would test the sense of the House on the subject.

Mr. WICKLIFFE requested Mr. S. to withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEWART referred him to

Mr. KENNON, who consented.

Mr. STEWART having thereupon withdrawn the motion,

Mr. WICKLIFFE demanded the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the CHAIR whether the previous question would include both resolutions, or apply only to the first?

The CHAIR replied that it would include both.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, now moved to lay the resolutions on the table; on which question he demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER said he must first ascertain whether the motion for the previous question was seconded.

The call for the previous question not having been seconded,

The question was put on laying the resolutions on the

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. WILDE resumed the floor, and concluded the course of his remarks in support of the bill, as given above. He was followed by

Mr. VINTON, of Ohio, who said he did not rise to enter into an examination of the details of the bill now before the committee. For reasons which he would assign, he should vote against the bill, without regard to its particular details. One only, of all the great interests in the country, said Mr. V. makes any call upon Congress to act on this subject: he meant that which is devoted to the production of cotton, rice, and tobacco, commonly called the planting interest. It complains of being unequally burdened and oppressed by the existing impost laws. He proposed to examine this complaint, and should endeavor to show it had no foundation in fact; that whatever of depression of labor, and of decay, there may be in the South, might be accounted for from other causes of general influence on that section of the Union: after which, he should present some other considerations, which, with him, were insuperable objections against acting upon the subject at all at the present session.

The South then demands a repeal of the existing impost laws, and an abandonment of the settled policy of the country, upon the faith of which great interests have been staked; on the allegation that those laws are unequal, and oppress slave labor; that they throw upon that labor more than its just proportion of the public burdens: in a word, the whole controversy, so long and so obstinately waged on this subject, is a mere question of equality of taxation. It was to that question, therefore, he should invite the particular attention of the committee.

The allegation is, that the taxation imposed by the impost laws, under the forms of the constitution, is, in fact, in violation of its spirit and meaning; that, in this particular, the constitution has been abused, to the injury of the complaining party.

Mr. Chairman, when individuals enter into an agreement, and afterwards a dispute arises as to the manner of executing it, or if either party complain of what he may be required by the other to do, we go back and inquire into the circumstances under which the agreement was entered into—the motives of the parties, and, most especially, into the consideration to be given or paid for the several stipulations. These are the lights which reason and justice direct us to resort to as our safest guides. When public compacts are brought into controversy, we resort to the same aids, and decide them by the same rules of interpretation. Let us apply these rules to the question of taxation now made under the constitution.

The constitution of the United States is an instrument founded on various known considerations, and was the result of mutual conciliation, and concessions of powers and interests, by the several parts and sections of the confederacy. The slave, or property representation, was one of those concessions. When the constitution was formed, an objection was made, by the delegates from some of the States, that slaves ought not to be represented; that is to say, that they ought not to have a vote in the making of laws, or in the choice of the Chief Magistrate, whose duty it was to execute those laws. It was said, among other things, that slaves, being property, they were not parties to the constitution, and had no agency or voice in making it; and, therefore, their owners ought no more to have a vote for them, than the owners of horses and cattle in those States where slaves did not exist. To this it was replied, that slaves were persons as well as property, and had some of the rights of persons; and if they were taxed, as they would be, the burdens of Government, unless they were represented, would be unequal, some of the States having no property of that description.

This difficulty was adjusted by resorting to the great and acknowledged axiom in politics, that taxation and representation are the true measure of the value of each other. Direct taxation, therefore, was made the basis of representation in Congress, and in the choice of the President; that being the only mode of taxation capable, in its nature, of being reduced to perfect equality. On these terms the owners of slaves got a vote in their account, according to the rule fixed in the constitution for representation and taxation. So that the political power of the country is composed of two distinct ingredients; that which represents the freemen of all the States, and that which represents the property in slaves. At the time the constitution went into operation, the property representation in Congress was between one-eighth and one-ninth of the whole body: it is now between one-ninth and one-tenth. Under the last census, it will be about one-tenth—one-ninth may be assumed as the average for the whole time. If, therefore, more than one-ninth of all the revenues of the Government have fallen on that description of property, then they who represent it here have a right to complain: if it have paid no more, then they have nothing to complain of. And that is the question to be settled. Now, then Mr. Chairman, for the facts. The revenue of the United States, from the 4th of March, 1789, when the constitution went into operation, to the close of the year 1832, is composed of the following items:

The Tariff Bill.

[JAN. 24, 1833.]

Customs,	-	-	$594,338,000
Postage,	-	-	1,090,000
Public lands,	-	-	40,152,000
Bank dividends, sales of bank stock, and bank bonus,	-	-	10,883,000
Direct taxes,	-	-	12,702,000
Miscellaneous items, say	-	-	5,000,000

One-ninth of this amount would give a requisition of seventy-six million two hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars, as the proportion of the slave property, in compensation or payment for its political power. The direct taxes being twelve million seven hundred and two thousand dollars, the one-ninth of that sum paid by the slave property is one million four hundred and eleven thousand dollars, leaving, of the proportion chargeable on the slave property, nearly seventy-five millions to be made up from other sources.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look into the other branches of the revenue, and see if it have paid that much of them. He would first take the internal revenue, amounting, as stated before, to twenty-two million two hundred and four thousand dollars. How was that made up? It was derived from excise on stills; carriages; retailers' licenses, stamps, and stamped vellum, parchment, and paper; refined sugar, and sales at auction. By looking into the treasury returns, gentlemen will find that the portion of these taxes paid by the country north of the Potomac is very much larger than its proportion of representation in this House. But what portion of them, he would ask, was paid by the slave, and thus operated as a tax or burden on the profits of his labor? Was the slave a consumer, to any extent, of distilled spirits? Did the slave enjoy the luxury of a carriage? Have retailers' licenses been granted to slaves, or are they the persons who are permitted to frequent such shops? When did they use vellum, parchment, and stamped paper? And if, per chance, they ever enjoyed a morsel of refined sugar, has not its ordinary consumption been reserved for the more refined palate of the master, and of the freemen of the North? It would be as difficult to show what they have had to do with sales at auction, the only remaining source of these internal duties. He was then justified in saying that the slave labor has been, substantially, exempt from any of the burdens of this class of taxes. They have fallen elsewhere.

The next item is the one million and ninety thousand dollars paid into the treasury from the Post Office. This is in addition to the large sums raised annually from postage, to sustain the establishment. It surely will not be claimed that the master has been oppressed by paying postages for the slave. Will any one here deny that the postage tax has always been paid by the people of the North far beyond their proportion of population or representation? Has not a large sum of money been annually raised by this tax from the people of the North, and paid out at the South and West, to meet the deficiencies of the establishment there? Must not this be a charge on the profits of Northern industry? And do not the South and West enjoy this luxury, an invaluable advantage, in part, at the expense of the North? Let us go, sir, somewhere else in search of unequal taxation and oppression of slave labor.

The next source of revenue has been from the public lands. Of the forty millions of dollars paid for them, is it not notorious that a vast majority of it has been received from the free States? And even in the slaveholding States, the money paid for the public land can in no sense be called a tax on slave labor. The slave, it is true, works the plantation, and is a part of the capital of its proprietor. The horse of my constituents sustains the same relations to the farm and its owner. And the price paid for the land he works on can with no more propriety be called a tax on the labor of the slave, than in the other case, on the labor of the horse! It would be absolutely ridiculous to take up time to show that, of the ten or eleven millions derived from bank dividends, bank bonus, and sales of bank stock, the slave labor has nothing to complain of. We must then look exclusively to the customs for the alleged oppression and inequality. In what manner, Mr. Chairman, and on what articles of slave consumption, has the sum of seventy-five millions, chargeable on the slave labor for its representation, after deducting the direct tax, been paid? How does the slave pay more than his proportion of the customs? Indeed, he would ask, how he paid his proportion? Is it not a fact, that slaves on the tide waters are coarser and cheaper fed and clothed than any other class of productive laborers in the country, and, consequently, consume less in value of articles paying duties? Of the ninety millions of dutiable articles imported during the last year, he did not think it could be shown the slave population consumed more than about two millions. There were very few articles within the range of their consumption. The mass of that importation is made up of tea, coffee, sugar, wine, silks, laces, broadcloths, and other finer manufactures of wool, fine cottons, hardware, linens, spirits, and many other articles of luxury; and of these the slave consumes nothing, or next to nothing. He did not know of any thing paying duties, except salt, coarse woollens, and blankets, that the slave habitually consumed. It was true, coarse cottons were also furnished them, but he believed nullification itself would admit they were purchased as cheap here as they could be any where. Now, sir, let us put this matter to the test of a little calculation. Take the Secretary's statement of the revenue for 1832 at thirty-one million seven hundred and fifty-two thousand, all of which has been applied to defray the expenses of Government, and extinguish the public debt. Suppose that sum had been raised by direct taxation. The assessment on the slave property, as it is now represented in Congress, would be nearly three and a half millions of dollars; and about three millions, as it will be represented in the next Congress. This is exclusive of the assessment on the free population in the slaveholding States. Now, sir, suppose the law of the last session had been in operation; a supposition which he had a right to make, since that act was complained of, and its repeal demanded. What portion, under the law of last session, of this sum of three millions and upwards, would the slave consumption of the last year have paid in duties, admitting (what is always disputed here) that the whole duty is a tax on the consumer? To appease the complaints of this interest, the duty on coarse woollens and coarse blankets had been brought down to five per cent. ad valorem, (a mere nominal duty,) by that act. The importation of coarse woollens and blankets amounted last year to one million six hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars. The duty, at five per cent., would be eighty-two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

He believed the consumption of salt was estimated in Europe at one-fourth of a bushel per annum for each person; say half a million of bushels of salt for the two millions of slaves, duty ten cents per bushel, fifty thousand dollars, making, in all, one hundred and thirty-two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, being about one twenty-fifth part of what the direct assessment would be on the whole slave population. In this calculation, the whole quantity of coarse woollens and blankets imported into the country is supposed to be consumed by the slave population. But he doubted whether the boatmen and other laborers in the non-slaveholding States did not consume the half or more of them. The truth is, the slaves in the interior, above tide water, are almost exclusively clothed in fabrics manufactured on the plantation. Nothing is now paid by direct taxation; and, instead of relieving the few articles consumed by the slave from duties, it would be a matter of strict justice and right to assess high imposts upon them, so as to make the owner pay something for the political power he enjoys on account of the slave. The property representation of South Carolina, under the last census, will be about one-sixtieth part of the whole representation in Congress. If Government were to raise thirty millions by direct tax, the assessment on the slaves of that State would be half a million of dollars, which is, perhaps, twice or three times the amount of all the duties that will be assessed, under the act of the last session, on the imported articles consumed by the slaves, not in South Carolina merely, but in the whole Union. He was aware it would be said that the slaves ought not to be at all grouped into one aggregate, since, on tide water, they are generally clothed in imported cloths, while those in the interior wear little or none; that this mode of calculation, therefore, made too small an allowance for the consumption of those near the Atlantic, and did not accurately estimate the pressure on their labor. Let us then, Mr. Chairman, subject this matter to the test of individual calculation. Suppose fifteen millions are to be raised by direct taxation, which, he believed, was the water-gruel standard down to which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means proposed to reduce the Government. The assessment on the slaves of South Carolina would be two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and on each of its three hundred and fifteen thousand slaves seventy-nine cents. Compare this with the indirect tax or duty the owners will pay under the act of the last session. And for this purpose, suppose the slave to be clothed in imported woollens, and allow for each slave, taking the whole population, large and small, male and female, a blanket and five square yards of woollen cloth per annum, which he presumed to be a liberal estimate. The account would stand thus:

Duty on five yards woollens, invoiced at thirty-five cents, at five per cent.	7½
Duty on one blanket, invoiced at seventy-five cents at five per cent.	3¾
Duty on one-fourth of a bushel of salt, at ten cents per bushel	2½

Cents, 14

Leaving a deficit of sixty-five cents out of the requisition of seventy-nine to be made up in some other way.

If the slave in Carolina consumes any other dutiable articles, or in greater quantities, he should be glad to be set right; and also that some gentleman would show how the remaining sixty-five cents were paid. Until that was done, he could not resist the conclusion that slave labor, so far from being oppressed, was, in truth, the most favored of any in this country.

We have seen, Mr. Chairman, what the property representation pays into the public treasury. Let me now, sir, direct your attention from these dry details to another view of this subject, and inquire what has been the value of this political power to that interest, and to the whole South. Has it not produced the most important results in the Executive administration, and in the legislation of the country? Is there any interest in the nation that has been so sedulously guarded, and so constantly and powerfully felt? Was it not the property vote, in the choice of the Chief Magistrate, that elected Thomas Jefferson over the elder Adams? and again in A. D. 1824, was it not the same property vote which gave to General Jackson that plurality which, in the opinion of the American people, conferred on him a just claim to the Executive chair? the denial of which by Congress was considered by the people to be an act of injustice towards him. Has not this property vote effected both of the great revolutions in the administration of this country, and the only revolutions that have ever taken place? Does this show it to be an oppressed interest? Has it secured to itself no valuable exemptions? By looking into the acts of Congress passed in 1807 and 1808, and also during the late war, making requisitions upon the States for militia for the service of the United States, it will be found those requisitions were made according to the militia returns of the several States, and not according to the rule of representation.

Is it nothing that the property representation shall have an important voice in deciding when the sword of the country shall be drawn, while the burden of drawing it is devolved on others? Was it not the same property vote here that made up the majority, which decided in its own favor, in the celebrated D'Auvert case, that when a slave falls in battle, or is disabled in the service of the country, the Government shall pay for the slave? While, on the other hand, if a farmer or mechanic be draughted as a militiaman into the service of the country, and he falls in battle, his widow and children are thrown unprovided for upon the mercy of the world. Who can tell what it may cost the country to defend this same property against the public enemy in war, or against its own efforts to liberate itself from bondage? Ought not that property, he would ask again, which enjoys this exemption, and has also an important vote in all the affairs of the country, to be content to pay liberally its portion of the public revenue without murmur or complaint?

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, for a moment to direct your attention to the general influence and practical operation of this property representation on the legislation of the country.

When the Government went into operation, this interest was put in possession of that power, and has, without interruption, enjoyed it since. At that time, the continental debt, and debt assumed by the constitution together, amounted to about eighty millions of dollars. The commerce of the country was in its earliest infancy; no one dreamed of the sudden expansion it was shortly destined to receive by the agitation of all Europe; direct taxes, like those now assessed by the States, were calculated upon as a principal resource to sustain the treasury; and, even in the year 1790, three years after the convention that formed the constitution, the impost yielded only three million and thirty thousand dollars, a sum insufficient to meet the interest of the public debt. Well, sir, in the enlarged expenses unavoidably growing out of the state of Europe, a direct tax of two millions per annum only was assessed in the administration of the elder Adams; and what followed? Why, sir, the very property representation that got its power to be paid for in that way, made war on the then existing administration on that account; and, as every one knows, the direct tax was one of the principal causes of its overthrow: and so very unpopular did that interest then make direct taxes by the General Government, that the experiment has never since been ventured upon, except under the severe pressure of the late war. And thus this power has practically got for itself an exemption from payment of the equivalent for which its representation was given.

One or two more facts, sir, on the subject of the oppression of this interest. Did it not lead the van in the embargo and non-importation acts which drove the commercial capital and industry of the country from the water to the land? Did it not take the lead in forcing that capital and industry, against all remonstrance, into the business of manufacturing? And now, when they have no place of refuge left, does it not threaten their annihilation? Did not this same property vote settle the Missouri question in its own favor? And was it not this interest that carried the Indian bill in 1830-'32? The property representation is the only infusion of aristocracy in the constitution. And whoever looks into the history of the United States, must be satisfied it has been incessantly applied to the industry, capital, legislation, and Executive administration of the country, first as the lever, and then as the screw, and now it threatens to draw the sword upon us to enforce new and unconstitutional exemptions in its favor. He said he did not say these things by way of complaint, but in answer to the complaints of others; he was satisfied with the constitution as it is. But if Carolina and Georgia, or any other States of this Union, desired so to amend that instrument as to disturb the existing adjustment of powers, he should say no, till it was accompanied with a proposition to give up the property vote. He would then, and not till then, begin to think of making the bargain over again. The constitution is known, as he said before, to have been the result of compromise and concession of interests; and if any State or section of the Union, while it retains, even to jealousy, all the advantages secured to it by that instrument, shall come and ask or demand of others a concession of what is inconvenient to the party making the request, (but very important to those of whom it is made,) it cannot in reason be expected that propositions so made will be viewed with much consideration or respect.

Will Carolina give up her property representation if that property were relieved from all taxation, both direct and indirect? He was sure she would not. And if so, it shows she has the advantage on her side in this particular arrangement of the constitution. He thought he had shown that the slave property was not now, and never had been, an oppressed interest in this country. We must look to other causes than legislation for the decay and pressure complained of at the South. He should advert to some of them before he sat down. He believed this would prove a most mischievous bill to the South; he referred, in particular, to the provision it contained for the admission of cotton into the United States free of duty. Nothing short of experimental proof will satisfy the cotton-growing interest that it derives any benefit from the duty now imposed. Should the bill pass into a law, he had no doubt that, in a very few years, loud calls would be made on Congress to restore the duty for protection against foreign competition; and, for one, he hoped it would be restored. Next to England, our own is the largest cotton market in the world, and is now occluded from all competition. Is it not quite apparent that the opening of so large a market to competitors will give a stimulus to the production of cotton abroad, and, to the same extent, produce a contrary effect at home? And is it not more than probable, that the stimulus thus given to production would depress the price abroad as well as at home? If the cotton-producing labor be depressed, as is alleged, is it not important to it to retain the exclusive possession of our own increasing and lucrative market? Can it be politic for a depressed and sinking interest to invite competition? The astonishingly increased and increasing consumption of cotton in all Europe and America, has directed the attention of the whole world to its cultivation, wherever it can be produced, and especially in those countries where human labor is most cheapened and depressed—in the East Indies, Egypt, Brazil, and other parts of South America. Is it not a fact that the home market is the best market, first served, and at the highest price? And what security has the cotton grower it would be so under the operation of this bill? He said these things, because the prosperity of the cotton and sugar industry was of the very first importance to the country he represented. If he were satisfied the planting and manufacturing interests were incompatible with each other, and could not stand together, he thought it would be better for the Western country that the manufacturing interest should fall; but he would decide between them as he would between his right and his left arm.

They both opened great markets for the staple products of the West, and every farmer in that country that follows the plough has a deep stake in sustaining them. All of the great departments of industry in this country are dependent upon each other; they are interwoven and wedded together in a thousand ways, and cannot be severed without violence to all. As the production of cotton and sugar is the most profitable employment of the labor of the slave, we, of the upper country, supply almost every thing that is consumed on the plantation, especially in Louisiana. And to give you some idea, Mr. Chairman, of the minutiae to which the supply descends, he would state that hay was carried in great quantities from the very sources of the Ohio to Louisiana, a distance of near two thousand miles, and there sold at a fair profit. We send our flour, beef, pork, lard, and other products, around to Mobile, Savannah, and Charleston, for the supply of the planters there. So important did he consider these cotton and sugar interests to be to his constituents, that he had never lost an opportunity to vote for any measure calculated to sustain or advance them. Accordingly, in the session of 1823-'24, when a distinguished gentleman from Virginia moved a reduction of the sugar duty, he had voted against it, when it escaped a reduction by a majority of three votes only, which, perhaps, might have been its ruin. Again, in 1836, being satisfied, after careful inquiry, that the reduction of the duty on French wines would essentially enlarge the cotton and tobacco markets in that country, he, with one other gentleman only of all the delegation in the Western country, voted for that law. The West was opposed to it, under the erroneous impression that it would diminish the consumption of spirits distilled from grain. The law, he believed, had had a happy effect upon that trade, even beyond what was then anticipated. Again, in 1828, on the representation of Southern gentlemen that their country was well fitted to the production of indigo, he had voted to lay a heavy duty upon it. In that, however, they were mistaken, and it had turned out to be a tax on the whole country, without benefit to any body but the foreign manufacturer. He mentioned these things, not because they were of great moment, but to show the principle and feelings upon which he had acted in respect to Southern industry. He had at all times voted to protect and encourage it. He had done, and he would do, the same thing for Northern capital and industry. In the face of every clamor he would "be just and fear not." For year after year he had listened to excited complaints of the oppressive influence of the manufacturing industry on slave labor. He had anxiously inquired into the subject, and with the sincerest desire to learn the truth, and yet had never been able to comprehend how it was that interest suffered, though he thought he could see how it was most materially benefited in the creation of an important home market for cotton. It was now little more than a quarter of a century since the cotton production grew up into any importance in South Carolina, and his inquiries had resulted in a fixed conviction that whether that State remained in or went out of the Union, that another quarter of a century would substantially put an end to the business there. The causes that were working its overthrow in Carolina were beyond the control of your legislation; it had no power to save it. He had already adverted to the powerful competition that was preparing to meet it in the world abroad, of which the fact that one hundred thousand slaves had been imported into Brazil during the last year, gave an appalling admonition. It had a still more formidable rival at home. The valley of the Mississippi could produce cotton enough to supply the consumption of Europe and America. One hand will grow as much cotton in Alabama or Louisiana, as two in South Carolina. As a natural consequence of this, we see the capital and labor of all the Southern States hurrying away after a more profitable investment as fast as the water runs down the Potomac; and it allures away, for the most part, precisely that description of labor and capital which are the most productive, and the loss of which is felt with the greatest severity. The young, healthy, and athletic slaves go away, leaving the superannuated and unprofitable behind, who are oftentimes a burden on their owners. This process will continue to go on till the rate of profit in the production of cotton on the rich lands of those fertile regions is brought down to the common level of the profit of capital devoted to other pursuits. When this condition of things comes, as come it must, the South Carolina planter, upon his exhausted and comparatively sterile soil, can no more stand the competition with his Western neighbors, than the people of New England could compete in the growing of wheat with Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the interior of Virginia; and that too, not for home consumption, but to be sent abroad to carry on the competition in the markets of the world. That the production of cotton is rapidly coming down to this condition of things in South Carolina, is conclusively shown by the fact that within the last thirty years the quantity of cotton produced in the United States has increased almost tenfold, and has nearly trebled since 1820, while the population of the cotton-growing States has increased in a far less ratio.

The struggle of South Carolina against the laws of capital and labor must be ineffectual. Can secession from the Union give her any relief? Will it not plainly accelerate this condition of things? If Carolina were separated from the Union, immediately the duty of three cents per pound upon her cotton would be exacted on importation into our markets. In other words, it would give to the other cotton-growing States the exclusive possession of the home market. And this, in its turn, would give a new and powerful impulse to the emigration of capital and labor. Secure in the enjoyment of the home market, they would forthwith go abroad, with increased activity and strength, into the competition for the markets of the world. Is it not apparent that Carolina must, in the end, take refuge from this unequal competition in manufactures and the mechanic arts; and that she will be obliged to bring into use the almost unrivalled water power which is to be found there, and in all the Southern States above tide water, and on the slopes of the Alleghanies? In this, she has a latent wealth and strength, of which no rivalry can dispossess her.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to advert to one topic connected with this subject, which has been constantly presented to the House for years past; the comparative prosperity of the North and the South. It is made use of to prove every thing. If you ask how, and on what articles of consumption, the South pays more taxes than the North, instead of a specific answer, you are told, in general terms, that the South has a fairer country and better climate than the North; that the latter is now rich, and the other poor; and this is relied on as conclusive evidence that the South has been robbed and plundered by your legislation, for the benefit of the North. In the eagerness to blame the tariff, all natural causes, all ordinary circumstances, and especially the influence of the habits of life, are wholly overlooked. He would put a case, which might not be exactly in point, but approximated somewhat towards the truth. Let it be granted that, taking a whole community together, the labor of one person is competent to the support of two; and let it also be admitted that slave labor is as persevering, skillful, and productive as free labor. Now suppose two communities in juxtaposition, each having a million of people; in one the half, and in the other the whole population shall labor. Upon this hypothesis, one would just make the two ends of the year meet, and accumulate nothing; while the residuum of the product of the other, after supporting itself, would be precisely equal to the support of a million of people; that is its accumulation. At the end of the first year, the contrast in the condition of the two might not be very striking; but this operation is repeated from year to year, for near half a century; in the one, every thing remaining nearly stationary, without any new employment of labor or capital; in the other, the accumulation of each successive year is carefully invested, it becomes itself an active principle, it multiplies employments, divides labor, puts machines in motion, more powerful and productive than hundreds of men. And now, sir, the contrast outstrips imagination itself.

Let me put a case a little nearer the ordinary walks of life. Suppose two young men, each inheriting fine estates, should set out in life together; one worked hard, and as his children grew up they labored with him, and all lived economically; his farm was well cultivated; his fences kept in good order; his stock of cattle and horses increased, and every year a little money was put out at interest, or invested in the purchase of additions to his farm, until, by the time his children are grown up, he is independent in his circumstances, and able to give them a good setting out in life. As for the other, if one-half of the family worked, the other was at play; he and his children went to horse races, wine parties, and places of amusement, until, by the time his children were grown up and ready to leave him, his farm was exhausted by bad cultivation, his fences gone to decay, and himself in debt. He now looks over into the fair fields of his neighbor, and takes it into his head that he has robbed him. Straightway he goes to him and says, "How is this, sir? Had I not, when we set out together, as good a farm as you? You are now rich, and I am poor; it is plain you have robbed me, and I will not submit to it any longer; the case is past all argument; you must surrender at discretion, and with becoming spirit, or I will proceed to 'nullify' you." Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that that man would listen to such a demand with much complacency, or disposition to obey it?

He had not said, and should not say, that the case of South Carolina and New England was parallel to the one he had now put.

But was it true that the South was going to decay? What are the evidences of it? Had not the products of her industry and her population increased? He imagined the decay complained of was to be found in the altered condition of that class which formerly held in its hands the wealth and influence of the country, rather than in a diminution of that wealth in the aggregate; it had changed owners, and the number of owners had been multiplied. He had often heard described, in glowing colors, on this floor, and in private circles, the wealth, and splendor, and hospitality of those colonial mansions at the South which are now in ruins. The revolution had, doubtless, brought about this change; but the legislation of Congress had had no agency in producing it. The spirit of the age required that the colonial laws of primogeniture and entailment of estates should be abolished. Their repeal had now broken those estates into fragments, and forced upon that class a reduction in the scale of living. We were now entered upon the second generation since their repeal, and had arrived precisely at that point where the pressure of the change was felt with the greatest severity. If any are willing to sacrifice the prosperity of the many to the happiness of the few, the States at the South have only to restore those laws, and again they will see the broad manor; the stately mansion will rise from its ruins, and become, as before, the seat of elegance, of luxury, and of refined hospitality. Whatever influence the legislation of Congress may have had upon the South, the causes to which he had adverted were, in his opinion, sufficient to account for all the changes there.

But, he said, if for no other cause, he would vote against the bill, on account of the state of our legislation on the subject of the tariff, and the attitude South Carolina had assumed in respect to it. At the last session we had staid here at the public expense near eight months, to adjust this question on a permanent basis. We had made a general reduction in the scale of duties, and brought down the duties on those articles consumed by slaves, and were said to oppress slave labor, almost to nominal rates, and far below what is paid by the free laborer on most of the articles consumed by him. We were called upon to allay the excitement in Carolina; to act in the spirit of conciliation, and by concession to save the Union. Influenced by these motives and considerations, he had voted for the bill of last session, against his better judgment; and when he found, along with the Middle and Western States, the votes of one-half of the South, and one-half of the North in favor of the bill, he did suppose that the question and its animosity were at an end. But the law had been spurned at, resented as a new insult to Carolina, and made the occasion of new demands on her part. That State had proceeded, under the assumed forms of law, to ordain that it should never be carried into execution in her territory; and she is now openly preparing to execute her determination by an appeal to the sword. The convention which adopted that ordinance had put forth an address to the people of the United States, in which they demand a repeal of the existing revenue laws, and a total abandonment of the principle of protection, as the only condition on which South Carolina will remain in the Union. But, they say they are willing to make a large offering to preserve the Union; and, as a concession on her part, they will consent to a law which imposes a uniform rate of duty on all imported articles, in case the revenue raised by the law shall be limited to such amount, and to such purposes, as South Carolina (not Congress) shall think necessary and proper. In this plan of taxation, they "are willing to acquiesce in a spirit of liberal concession, provided they are met in due time, and in a becoming spirit."

Now, sir, he could not but feel, that to pass a law while that ordinance and address were unrecalled, would be to disgrace Congress, and dishonor the nation; it would plant the seeds of rebellion in every State in the Union. The convention had not deigned to tell us what is meant by "a becoming spirit;" and he knew not what it was, except, indeed, it be, in the spirit of submission, to vote the repeal on our bended knees. The convention did not, and could not expect a compliance; its language is not couched even in terms of ordinary civility; it is the language of a master to a slave. A demand, under such circumstances, and in such form, of an abandonment of the principle of protection, and the abolition of discriminating duties, is, in effect, to demand, in a form unknown to the constitution, an amendment to that instrument, of vital moment to the Union; which, if yielded to, will not only supersede hereafter amendments and redress of grievances, according to the forms of law, but will forever, and effectually, prostrate the power of Congress before the mandates of State authority. No one can avoid the conviction that the convention desired no accommodation; that its real object was the prostration of the authority of Congress: since the ordinance and address, it had set up pretensions, with an avowed determination never to yield them, which it must have known could never be acceded to. What nation, Mr. Chairman, ever was there on earth, which had a custom-house, or collected a dollar on imports, that had not had, as between different articles, its discriminating duties? Can any gentleman imagine for a moment that, if such a pretension had been set up and insisted on at the time the constitution was made, that instrument would ever have been adopted? a pretension opposed to the uniform experience and settled opinions of all nations, both then and now. But such, sir, is the concession on her part, and such the condition on which alone South Carolina will consent to obey your revenue laws.

He had nothing to say upon the doctrines and theory of nullification and secession, which the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE,] who last addressed the committee, tells us will be carried into execution, if we attempt to enforce obedience to our laws. They who choose may elaborate theories of Government, and embody them in the form of resolves. To that he had no objection; they had an undoubted right to do so. But this much he would venture to say, in reply to the gentleman, that, if an attempt to carry out these doctrines and put them into practice was ever made, it would be met at the point of the sword. Whoever examines the geographical structure of the country, and the dependency of its parts, must be satisfied of the truth of what he now said. These doctrines go not merely to subvert the Union of these States, but to reduce the great interior of the nation, destined to contain a vast majority of its population, to a state of absolute vassalage to its Atlantic exterior. Let Louisiana, for example, secede, and form an independent Government—does she not lay tributary to her the whole interior, from the summits of the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains? Is it a question to be reasoned about? Must not we on the Ohio, and they on the Missouri, for common preservation, and of common necessity, draw the sword, and cut a passage into the Gulf of Mexico?

If the principle be established any where, it becomes the law of all, and the right of all the States in the Union. How long, sir, might it not be, before a spirit of cupidity might seize upon New York, and she be induced to think that, of right, she ought to enjoy, in a separate Government, those advantages of nature, which made some of her keen-sighted politicians of that day averse to the restraints of the present constitution? Cut off, on the right and the left, from access to the ocean, what should we be but "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to those who laid us tributary? And that is not all, sir, so far as respects the State from which he came. Under the guaranty in the constitution, "that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," we claim the right to go and come about our lawful business, when and where we please, within the limits of this confederacy. Trusting to that guaranty, the people of the State of Ohio had, with great effort, and at much expense, united the waters of the Gulf of Mexico with those of the Hudson and St. Lawrence. And in the completion of the public works now in progress in Pennsylvania and on the Potomac, they look forward to important outlets through the Delaware and Chesapeake. Could they suffer these avenues to their country to be seized upon, and this constitutional guaranty wrested from them, by those who hold the keys that unlock the interior? Are not New Hampshire and Vermont wholly at the mercy of Massachusetts and New York? To the whole line of interior, from New Hampshire to the Rocky Mountains, embracing a great majority of the territory of the Union, and nearly half of its population at this time, it is nothing more nor less than a question of submission and slavery. In all that region, to the obligation of the constitution to preserve the Union nature has superadded the obligation of necessity—a necessity that will exist, undiminished in force, while the waters of the Mississippi shall move on in their courses. Constitutional obligations, sir, may be broken down; but the laws of nature cannot. The North and the South may find an interest in separation; but the interior never can. And, whether the attempt be made in New England or in South Carolina, it requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell that the whole interior will draw its united sword to put it down. Sir, the anchor of our Union hangs upon the great interior. Every year will imbed it deeper and deeper, and give it increasing strength and tenacity, until, after another generation, it can never be dragged up from its immovable moorings. He had no fears for the Union; because nature had invested the interior with authority, for its own preservation, to command the public peace here on the Atlantic, and a little time will give it power to see that its mandates are obeyed.

The gentleman from Georgia had called upon all the great interests in the country, and all the parties in this House, to aid in carrying this bill, and had threatened all with disunion, as the consequence of refusal. He had thought proper to invoke the friends of the Vice President elect to vote for the bill, and not to lose the present opportunity, lest the friends of two distinguished Senators should make common cause in favor of Carolina, against what he was pleased to denominate "the giant and the magician." Respecting the plain inference from this invitation, that the Vice President and his friends here are capable of acting, on this great question, from personal motives, he had nothing to say. The keeping of the honor of the Vice President, or that of his friends in this House, was not committed to his hands; they might vindicate his and their own honor in such way as they thought proper. As the friend of one of the Senators, he felt he had a right to speak. He spoke for himself only, not for that Senator, or for others of his friends. We had fallen, it is true, but, nevertheless, we stood "by our principles, and upon our principles." Though we had fallen, South Carolina must expect no aid or countenance from us. The gentleman should have remembered that protection to industry, and obedience to the laws, were inscribed on our banner. That banner is yet unfurled. The call for aid comes too late. If, on the nomination of Mordecai M. Noah, in 1830, instead of giving, by his casting vote, the seal of approbation to the corrupt and proscriptive doctrine that "to the victor belong the spoils of victory," he had then cried from the watch tower that the citadel of liberty was about to fall by sap and by mine, and had then come to the aid of freedom of opinion, he would this day have stood forth prominently before the American people, in the great moral revolution that must have followed. But he thought proper to throw his influence into the contrary scale.

Since the gentleman from Georgia had thought proper to introduce the name of the late Vice President in connexion with this subject, he would take the liberty to say that, in his conscience, he believed it was the disappointed and repressed ambition of that individual that now agitated South Carolina. Do not you think, Mr. Chairman, that if that individual could attain, or had a prospect of attaining, the object of his desire, the gathering tempest would soon disperse, and, in place of the lowering cloud that now hangs over the horizon in Carolina, the sun would shine as clear, and all the elements there become as calm and joyous as in a lovely summer's day?

The gentleman, sir, has avowed his determination to oppose the President, the man of his own choice, in the execution of the laws. From what he said, it is evident that gentleman had supported the re-election of General Jackson for the very reason that he [Mr. V.] had opposed it. He [Mr. V.] had long foreseen the crisis at which we had now arrived. He had looked anxiously on upon certain transactions in this country, and examined critically the tendency and consequences of certain doctrines which had emanated from the Chief Magistrate, and he must say that he was filled with fear and trembling lest the laws should go unexecuted, and the Government be suffered to run down into absolute anarchy. We had both been disappointed, and at the point where the gentleman deserts the President, to oppose the laws, he pledged himself, for one, to come up to his aid to enforce their execution. The gentleman, in that part of his speech, demanded to know if we intended to keep up the tariff to provide the means of carrying on war against South Carolina. He would answer, no. We have no power, under the constitution, to make war on Carolina, but we have power to suppress insurrection there, and he trusted, if necessary, it would be done. He had also emphatically told us, that "if nullification is at an end, revolution has begun." This, sir, is a case in which the name will be determined by the result; and, until success be attained, the gentleman must permit the friends of the constitution to call armed resistance there by the less grateful name of rebellion. The gentleman made an attempt to throw obloquy on the idea that liberty was to be maintained by force. He seems to understand liberty to be the right of every man to do as he chooses without restraint. Whether the gentleman got his idea of liberty from a certain foreign professor in South Carolina, or imported it himself, he knew not; but he did know that it was not of American origin. It was but another name for anarchy, and he agreed with the gentleman, such liberty was not worth the employment of force in its cause. American liberty, sir, is a regulated right; it is the right of every man to do as he chooses, subject to the restraints imposed by the public will for the public good. It was to obtain liberty, in that sense of the term, that our fathers had freely poured out their blood, and to preserve which, if needs must be, he trusted it would again be as freely shed.

And last of all, sir, the gentleman has ventured upon the first regular beat up for volunteers to rebellion that we have had on this floor. He calls upon the Southern States to resist, and form a Southern confederacy. He has assured us they will resist, and will succeed. According to the fashion of the day, the question is presented as though the longer continuance of the South in the Union was a matter of favor, not of interest. Is this true, Mr. Chairman? Has not the South as deep a stake in the Union as any portion of our wide-spread empire? He cheerfully admitted that, in bravery, in intelligence, and in firmness of purpose, the people of the South were not inferior to any in the Union. And with all these qualities, was it not true that the tide water region, below the Potomac, was the weakest and most exposed section of our country? The formation of the country, and the existence within its bosom of a large mass of a particular description of population, render it inherently weak. Are not the people of the North and West, to some extent, the natural protectors of that country?

The gentleman somewhat vauntingly assured us that Virginia will draw the sword for Carolina, and named the Potomac as the boundary of his new empire; but he wisely left its western limits undefined. He claimed no right to speak for Virginia; but he would venture to predict the gentleman was mistaken. There was in Virginia too much of good sense, of patriotism, of devotion to country, and too deep a stake there in this Union, for her to commit such an act of political suicide. He knew Western Virginia personally, and he knew it well. There was nowhere more devotion to the Union, more contentment under its laws; and it will prove a vain illusion to imagine that the people of Western Virginia will unite themselves to such a confederacy, formed on such principles, and thereby forever and irrevocably subject themselves to the dominion of that policy which they never cease to oppose and protest against. Does not the wide-spread territory of Virginia, in the very heart and centre of the republic, give to her a power and consequence and respect among her sister States, which her wealth, her population, and her resources, could not command for her if she were situated on the exterior of the Union? She must forever possess greater political advantages, from her geographical position, than any other State in the Union. What infatuation, then, can ever seize upon her voluntarily to throw away these advantages, to cast down the standard that her own Washington bore up, and array herself under the palmetto, the growth of another clime?

By thus making herself an exterior State of the new confederacy, would she not cast all these advantages into the lap of South Carolina? And, worse than that, situated on the frontier of a confederacy more populous, more abundant in resources, and possessed of a powerful marine, she must be ever exposed, by her open waters, and long line of inland boundary, to the ravages of unequal war. Has she not every thing to lose, and nothing to gain, by such an alliance? No, sir! Virginia will hold fast to the Union; and, aside from all considerations of patriotism and love of country, in which none excel her, the sleepless sagacity of her clear-sighted statesmen, and the intelligence of her people, will never betray her into such a step of political folly and stupidity.

There was one other heresy, which had been so often repeated on all sides of the House, that he could not refrain from noticing it. It was, that sooner than shed blood, it would be better to give up the Union; that when blood should be shed, the Government will be at an end. He thought this was setting too light an estimate on the value of the Union, and on its power to preserve itself. What people, sir, ever existed, who have not had seasons of civil commotion? And what Government is there on earth, however worthless, that has not defended itself against them? Can we expect that which has happened to all other nations will not happen to us in the progress of our history? And is this Government alone without the power of self-preservation? The causes of civil commotion every where lie deeper than the foundations of Government. They are the volcanoes over which Government is built, and the most it can do is to suppress their irruption, or ward off their violence.

The seeds of civil commotion are sown in the passions, prejudices, ambition, cupidity, and injustice of the individuals of which communities are composed. And when we consider the great variety of exciting principles in this extended country, it is wonderful, and we have great cause for thankfulness to the Supreme Ruler of the universe, that we have so long enjoyed a degree of tranquillity, prosperity, and happiness, such as has never fallen to the lot of any other people. But we cannot reasonably hope it will always be so. We must expect seasons of trial and peril to the Union will come; but he had an unshaken faith that, come when they may, it will prove triumphant, and go down to a glorious immortality. The fruits of this our Union show it to be the most precious Government the world ever saw. And, if necessary, we ought to sacrifice more of treasure and of life for its preservation than was ever offered up for any other cause. Sir, the constitution of the United States is the consummation of that liberty and union which our fathers purchased with blood, with suffering, and with treasure. It is a perpetual covenant between them and us, and our posterity. They have transmitted the precious inheritance to us, and we are bound, at every cost, to hand it down to those who shall come after us. And for one, horrible as the alternative may be, he would consent that every man of us on this floor should be swept away, that every river in the land should run with blood, and one-half of this fair generation perish by the sword, sooner than one word or syllable of that constitution should be obliterated by force. That constitution, sir, is more precious than blood. And if there are any in this House who do not feel the same fixed determination to sustain the liberties of this country, he was sure there were millions out of it who did. When force shall triumph over the constitution, the Government is at an end, and with it, the hopes of freedom, and the cause of liberty, every where are extinct. What he now said was not in reference to any existing excitement or disaffection, but of the value of the Union in the abstract, and of the cause of the Union, let any movement against it come whence it may, and when it may.

Mr. V. said he wished to advert to one other topic, and one only, connected with this bill, before he sat down. The scale of duties in this bill is framed upon the supposition that the public lands will continue to be a permanent branch of the revenue, and yield two and a half millions per annum. The fallacy of calculating upon the lands as a branch of the permanent revenue, has been repeatedly commented upon during the debate, on account of the very great probability there is that the public domain will cease to be a source of revenue, either in the way recommended by the President, or in the mode indicated in the Senate's bill, which passed at the last session, and is now pending in that body again, with every prospect of being sent to this House. He desired to suggest, for the consideration of the House now in advance of that bill, that the question whether the proceeds of the lands should be retained in the treasury, or divided among the States, after the payment of the public debt, was not a question of political expediency, as gentlemen seemed to think, but one of good faith and obligation. The history of that day shows that the great object of the cession of the public domain to the United States was the payment of the national debt. At that time the debt and other expenses of the General Government were provided for by requisitions on the several States, which raised their respective quotas in their own way. As these lands were ceded in this state of things as a common fund for the States respectively, it became necessary to create a common agent or trustee, to act for all in converting them into money. Accordingly, the cession of Virginia, for example, and to which the subsequent cessions conformed, was made to the confederation for the use of the States respectively, Virginia inclusive. The language of the deed of cession is in these words: "All the within territory so ceded to the United States shall be considered as a common fund for the use and the benefit of such of the United States as have become members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." This language shows that the confederation took the title but not the interest in the ceded territory: it took it to sell and pay out the proceeds—that it was a common fund—that it was a fund for the use and benefit of the States respectively or individually; in other words, that it was the property of the States; that it was owned by them in different proportions; the words, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," being used in the grant not to designate the objects of the grant, but to fix a rule by which to ascertain the share or interest of each State. As the lands were intended to pay the public debt, and sustain public credit, the proceeds were (as in good faith they ought to have been) speci-cally pledged for the satisfaction of the common debt of all. When the Government of the confederation was broken up, the agent or trustee ceased to exist. It therefore became necessary to create a new agent to dispose of the lands according to the objects of the grant, otherwise the grant must have been without an agent to execute its provisions. The new Government about to be created was the natural agent to do this. Accordingly, the constitution, in the third section of the fourth article, provides for this specific object in these words: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territories or other property of the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." The qualifying clause reserves the rights of the States, and the clause itself gives a disposing power only over, not an interest in, the property. Nothing can be plainer than that the General Government holds as a trustee, and never had the use of the land invested in it. The convention exercised great caution on the subject of the engagements of the confederation. And they further provided, in the first clause of the sixth article, "that all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation." The compact of cession was an engagement of the confederation; and the public domain now stands on the precise footing it did the day of the grant. The General Government, then, holds the public land ceded by Virginia, as a trustee for the use of the States, Virginia inclusive, subject to the payment of a common debt of all. When the debt is paid, the residuum belongs to the States, in the proportions prescribed by the deed of cession; and the trustee cannot appropriate that residuum to its own use, or give it away to a part of the States, without a breach of good faith, and violating its express obligations. The scale of duties, then, ought to be adjusted without regard to the proceeds of the public lands, after the payment of the public debt. And that will alter the whole structure of the bill. He was aware this view of the duty of Congress did not apply to the territory ceded by France and Spain; but it did apply to the country from which the great mass of that branch of the revenue was derived.

[The speech of Mr. V. is given above unbroken, but, after he had proceeded a considerable time, he gave way for a motion by

Mr. ARNOLD, for the rising of the committee.

The motion prevailed: Yeas 69, nays 62.

So the committee rose.]

In the House, Mr. SPEIGHT moved again to go into committee, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. IRVIN moved an adjournment.

Mr. SPEIGHT demanded the yeas and nays on this motion. They were taken accordingly, and stood as follows: Yeas 75, nays 78.

So the House refused to adjourn.

[It was now past 4 o'clock.]

Mr. SPEIGHT renewed his motion to go into committee.

Mr. BURD demanded a call of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR said that, if the gentleman would withdraw that motion, he would assent to a recess till 6 o'clock.

Mr. BURD declining to do so, the yeas and nays were taken on calling the House, and resulted as follows: Yeas 55, nays 95.

So the call was refused.

Mr. SUTHERLAND now moved an adjournment.

Mr. WILDE demanded the yeas and nays—being taken, they were: Yeas 76, nays 86.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring on Mr. SPEIGHT's motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. ARNOLD demanded the yeas and nays—being taken, they were as follows: Yeas 90, nays 75.

The House thereupon went again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. VINTON resumed the course of his remarks.

At about 6 o'clock Mr. EVERETT moved for the rising of the committee. The motion was negatived: Yeas 57, nays 63.

Mr. VINTON then resumed, and continued to occupy the floor until near 7 o'clock.

During the course of Mr. V.'s speech, he had observed that "he would sooner see every man who occupied the seats around him swept away; he would sooner see the rivers of this land run with blood, and one-half of the population of this fair republic perish by the sword, than see one jot or one tittle of that sacred constitution which had been bequeathed to us by our fathers, or of the laws, obliterated by force;" when a sudden cry was heard from Mr. McDUFFIE, of "Robespierre!" followed by some slight hisses from different quarters of the hall. The CHAIR called to order.

Mr. CARSON said that the gentleman had a right to give utterance to his indignant feeling at such a sentiment.

The CHAIR [Mr. WAYNE] replied that he was not clothed in vain with power to preserve order in the House, and he should not fail to exercise it.

Considerable sensation prevailed for a moment, but it soon subsided.

When Mr. VINTON had concluded his speech,

Mr. CARSON rose to explain. It had not been he (as seemed to be supposed by many gentlemen) who had uttered the expressive word "Robespierre," when the gentleman from Ohio had expressed a sentiment so monstrous. That word had been uttered by a gentleman over the way, who would never disavow his words. Deeply as Mr. C. felt, he should have remained silent; but when he heard the hissing which arose, he could not but express what he had done. But, my G-d! exclaimed Mr. C., what have we heard! heard it here! on the floor of an American Congress! That the gentleman would see every man on this floor swept off from it—all the talent, all the patriotism, all the noble spirits in that hall swept off! But was that all? No. But that he would see the rivers of this whole country run blood, and half the population of this our fair inheritance put to the sword, rather than that constitution should be violated, which Mr. C. had heard the gentleman himself declare to have been already violated, and which men, far superior both to that gentleman and to himself, believed to have been repeatedly violated—half the population! by which the gentleman meant his brethren—and this, after a sovereign State had pronounced the law in question to be unconstitutional!

Mr. VINTON here asked leave to set the gentleman right as to what he had said.

The CHAIR. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. CARSON. No; if the gentleman would but put himself right—

Mr. WATMOUGH here interposed, and called his friend from North Carolina to order. He begged his friend to suffer him to interpose, and step before him, to save him from himself, before any thing should be uttered which might be cause of lasting regret. The gentleman from Ohio had not said what the gentleman was under an impression that he had. The gentleman had been remarking on—

Here Mr. WATMOUGH was called to order by many voices; and the CHAIR admonished him that he was departing from rule.

Mr. CARSON said he would take the admonition of his friend, although he believed that his friend had been even more out of order than himself. It had been with deep regret that he had expressed his emotions at what he had understood the gentleman from Ohio to have said. The gentleman might attempt to palliate the sentiment; but, unless he wholly retracted, all attempts to explain it away would be unavailing.

Mr. VINTON now explained. He had made no use of the word "violated." A violation of the constitution might happen through mere misapprehension of judgment. What he had said was, that sooner than see the constitution obliterated by force, he would see the alternative he had mentioned. Because he considered that as a total annihilation of the constitution, which must put an end to the Government.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he was very sorry that he found himself under the necessity, from what had just occurred, of addressing the Chair at all. It had been his fixed purpose, and still was, to take no part in the present discussion: and he was very sorry that what had occurred in the House, rendered it now necessary for him to say a single word. When the gentleman from Ohio had uttered that sentiment which the House, he presumed, had heard with a portion of that abhorrence it had excited in his own mind, he could not help involuntarily making the exclamation he had uttered. He admitted that, strictly considered, it could not be said to be perfectly in order, though it was no more than what often happened in all parts of the world. As he had been out of order, he owed an apology to the House, but none to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WATMOUGH now moved for the rising of the committee; but the motion failed: Yeas 68, nays 72. Mr. W. proceeded to address the committee in opposition to the bill. After he had spoken nearly an hour, he gave way to Mr. DENNY, who moved the committee rise, which was negatived: Yeas 60, nays 71.

Mr. W. proceeded, and concluded his speech. The following is the speech of Mr. W. entire:

Mr. WATMOUGH said that he had certainly cause to regret deeply the necessity which drove him or any other member to continue a discussion so important in all its bearings upon the welfare and happiness of the great body of the people of the United States, at an hour and under circumstances so little calculated to ensure it a patient hearing or a just issue. But, said Mr. W., since the committee has refused to rise, however loath I may be, from actual physical exhaustion, or unprepared, from any other cause, I shall not flinch from the performance of the duty I owe my country and my constituents. I promise, however, Mr. Chairman, to occupy as little of your time as possible, and shall endeavor to be as concise as the nature and importance of my subject will admit. I feel, sir, in common with my friends on this floor, the immense responsibility of our position, and am equally aware of my own incompetency to fulfil the paramount duties it involves. I am sustained, however, by the consciousness of an honest zeal, elevated above every consideration of a personal character, and cherished and animated by all those moral impulses which ought to govern the man who loves his country honestly and sincerely. It cannot be denied, sir, but that we have reached a fearful crisis in the annals of our country. A long period of the most brilliant prosperity is either about to be closed forever, and with it are to vanish forever all the brightest and surest hopes of the patriot and philanthropist, or the consequences and results of a wise and temperate system of legislation are to be continued and perpetuated to the benefit of our latest posterity. Never, perhaps, has greater responsibility devolved upon any set of legislators at any previous period. Never, certainly, has any Congress sat in this country under circumstances demanding greater fortitude, more singleness of purpose, more mature, calm deliberation on the part of every member composing it, than the present. What, sir, is it we are called upon to do? The abstract proposition upon which we are called to act, is sufficiently simple in itself, and in reference to it there is believed to be no difference of opinion whatever. "To reduce the revenue to such a limit as shall be consistent with the simplicity of an economical Government, and necessary to an efficient public service," is an object to which no man could have the hardihood to refuse his support, and the expediency and sound policy of which no one can question. The great and vital question now agitating the whole country, is the means by which this is to be effected with the least possible detriment to existing establishments.

When I returned to my own constituents at the close of the last session, Mr. Chairman, I congratulated them and my country that that great object had been effected, and although not in a manner to secure for it my vote, still that, by an overwhelming vote of both Houses of Congress, the revenue had been reduced to the wants, or nearly so, of the Government, the more immediate cause of complaint existing in a certain quarter entirely removed, while, at the same time, the vast interests in which they themselves were more immediately concerned, in common with a large majority of the people of the United States, were preserved from immediate ruin and prostration. Though little satisfied with the attempt that had been made, on grounds which they consider in no other light than as purely political, to sap the sources of their prosperity, and depreciate the value of their labor and investments, still, sir, they acquiesced, and, under a feeling of full security for the future, they set themselves to work, each in his several vocation, determining, by increased efforts of economy, to make up for what they had lost in protection from their country. They, as well as myself, sir, considered the bill of July, 1852, as a bill of compromise, and notwithstanding that, amid the general clamor against the tariff raised in the South, no facts of a material nature had been presented to their minds, either through the medium of this House, or the public prints. I repeat it, sir, no facts proving that ruin or any amount of ruin resulting from the protective system to their brethren of the South had ever been presented to their minds, sufficient to satisfy them of the necessity of a rapid and ruinous reduction. Yet, in the spirit of patriotism, and of a just and honorable submission to the laws of the land, they acknowledged the wisdom of Congress; and hoped that the policy which had been established from the commencement of the Government, and from which so much prosperity, both individual and national, has resulted, was at length fixed, and confirmed and perpetuated.

What then, sir, was their astonishment, I will not speak of my own, when, at the opening of the present session, the whole subject was again brought before us—new views presented—new grounds taken, and the same body whose voice had been so lately and so explicitly made known, again invoked to reverse their judgment, to reverse their painful and laborious discussions, to the entire exclusion of all other matters, either of private or public character; totally unsettle the value of some hundreds of millions of dollars, and disturb the even current of all commercial as well as manufacturing arrangements! And was not this the case, sir? Assuredly it was—it is. In vain do we ask the question, to what purpose? In vain do we endeavor to find out the defects of existing laws, which, although deemed sufficient some few months ago, are now denounced, without even having the benefit of a trial—the period of their going into operation not having actually arrived. Is there any fairness in such a course of public policy? Is it just, sir, to those who, upon the strength of the public faith as pledged by the laws of the land, invest their labor and capital in such mode and manner as these very laws have prescribed? Is it consistent? Above all, sir, is it creditable to our institutions, or to the intelligence of these Houses of Congress? Rather is it not highly injurious in its effects upon the opinions of all classes of men in the community?

The Tariff Bill.

It seems to me, sir, that if the worst and bitterest enemies of our country were deliberately to set themselves to work, to bring our institutions into disrepute, and destroy the affection now so ardently cherished towards them by our countrymen, they could devise no better means. It affects equally the farmer and the merchant. The farmer, whom it disappoints of the only market which foreign avarice and rapacity allow to his produce. Upon the merchant, whose arrangement it destroys, and whom it incapacitates from planning voyages of any length, for fear that, before they shall have become completed, other laws and other enactments may tend to deprive him entirely of all the benefits that his enterprises and assiduity have fairly entitled him to. Need I say what becomes of the manufacturer, whose very bread depends upon the fixedness of our legislation and the sound maintenance of the public faith solemnly pledged to him by frequent consecutive enactments? No, sir; that is too plainly told. Your tables groan under the weight of petitions and memorials sent in to us from all parts. Meetings more numerous attended than at any former period of our Government, and headed by the purest, soundest, and most intelligent men of all parts of the country, tell but too plainly the fate which hangs over them, and remonstrate, in terms not to be misunderstood, against the impending ruin. Legislatures, too, have sent their solemn protests against this unsettled and vacillating course of policy. That of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, with that good sense, integrity, and firmness, which has ever distinguished it, by a vote of the two Houses, of 115 to 14, nearly unanimously, has resolved that, in its "opinion, the bill now under consideration in the House of Representatives of the United States ought not to become a law; and that no reduction of duties ought to be made, calculated to affect the successful prosecution of our domestic manufactures, or in any way impair the faith of the Government, by which the enterprise of our own citizens would be checked, and successful domestic competition retarded."

This, sir, is language not to be misunderstood. It would be sufficient guide for me, even in the absence of that unbounded prosperity which is apparent throughout the wide extent of our whole country. What then is it, sir, that actuates us? what madness impels us? Let it be no longer concealed. There is no doubt there are other causes than the simple and purely patriotic one with which we have set out, that of reducing the revenue to a just scale to meet the wants of the Government; and there is certainly as little doubt on my mind that there should exist no intention on the part of this, or any Congress, hastily to abandon the ground so lately assumed, at the dictation, or under the pressure of the causes to which I allude; much less abrogate any of the great principles of the country under the pressure of circumstances which deny to it the exercise of a calm, deliberate, dispassionate judgment.

I mean not, Mr. Chairman, to add to the existing irritation, already sufficiently great, by any remarks of mine. I feel too warm an admiration, too high a regard for some of the distinguished individuals of the South whose feelings have become too deeply and sadly implicated in this matter, and whose sound and excellent judgments have of late become so fatally obscured. I seek to avoid every thing that may wound or harass; but, in so doing, I shall take good care to be unwavering in my own judgment, humble as it is, unflinching in my duty to my constituents, and above all, most faithful to the blessed constitution, which is and must continue to be the ever-during cement of our glorious Union. I have long anticipated the approaching crisis; I have long known that the gratifying period at which this great nation should afford the novel and truly sublime aspect of a nation disenthralled, disencumbered from public debt, could not arrive without bringing with it evils and developing springs of political action which might shake her to her very foundation; it was to be expected, but, being expected, it is to be met in a manner becoming the momentous exigency. The doctrine of State rights, sir, is the one which, if carried to the extreme we have lived to witness, predestined to threaten the total subversion of our happy Union. It is true that, in a form much modified, it has always constituted the basis of the great democratic party. In my own State I know this to be the case: there, it has always been sufficient, in our political canvasses, to overwhelm a candidate by succeeding to attach to him the name even of federalist; but sir, in those cases the people looked not to remote ultimate consequences: satisfied with their success, and temperate in its indulgence, they never dreamed of setting up a power or a principle antagonist to the paramount principle contained in the constitution of the United States, and upon which the soul, the immortal part of that constitution, the Union, depends. No, sir, their affection for this Union is an all-engrossing sentiment of their hearts. They will do nothing to impair it; they will denounce the public servant whose word or deed may tend to weaken its consistency; and when the two great principles of union and liberty, now and forever, one and inseparable, and that of State rights with anarchy and conflicting interests, shall be fairly laid before them, which to choose, they will not for a moment hesitate; they will cling to the Union as to the rock of their political safety, and repudiate at once pretensions fraught with nothing but eventual ruin.

And this, Mr. Chairman, brings me to what I consider the true question now before us. It is not the bill on your table. It is not, in truth, whether the revenue shall be twelve or fifteen millions of dollars. It is rather, and every thing proves it, whether the States or the constitution shall be paramount—whether the just and hitherto acknowledged powers of the one shall be annihilated, that the pretensions of the other may predominate. I beg gentlemen to come out boldly at once, and avow their purpose. I implore them not to heap the odium which in their minds wholly attaches itself to the proclamation, a noble and distinguished State paper, and one that in aftertimes will go far to relieve this administration from many a foul stain—not, I say, heap all the odium of that document upon the tariff and on the protective system. It is not candid, it is not worthy of them. It is a course unbecoming their hitherto high chivalric bearing. In my humble opinion, the bill before us should at once be laid on the table, and the question substituted, shall the constitution live or die? The issue, then, could not be doubtful; and having decided as we should be bound to decide by our oaths, by the solemn obligations we owe our God, and our country, and the sacred duty we feel to the millions who are to come after us, we might then take time to ascertain the unequal bearing of existing laws, and relieve from pressure the parts found to be unjustly affected.

But, sir, no such opportunity is presented to us. We are pushed hard. State right nullification in the South, and practical nullification here, drive steadily onward to their purpose; and between the two, God save the mark! Already, under the influence of the latter, one great principle after another vanishes, and is erased from your statute book. The system of internal improvement is dead; the great system of our public lands threatened with annihilation; a deadly blow aimed at our most important national institution, the Bank; while, by the bill before you, which comes directly from the Executive Departments, as it were, the whole protective system is levelled with the dust. Not even has the judiciary escaped. What, then, is left for us to do? Nothing, Mr. Chairman, but firmly and manfully to adhere to the constitution as we believe in it, and to fearlessly expose the ruin which on all sides threatens. And this, sir, brings me more immediately to the bill now before you. I shall not detain the committee much longer, Mr. Chairman. I am aware of the fatigue which every member must feel after a session so protracted as the one we have had to-day. I feel it myself sufficiently. I shall endeavor to come speedily to a close.

The Tariff Bill.

I have not been able to discover one feature of the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which I can give my sanction. Approving of its object, of reducing the revenue to meet the existing state of affairs in the country, I disapprove altogether of the means proposed to effect it; nor do I stand alone in this—not one single voice of approval has reached us from any quarter in reference to it. It is universally considered, as I am sure it will prove, entirely destructive of all the best interests of the country. It does not even possess the recommendation of being satisfactory to the South. It ruins nineteen-twentieths, and is unpalatable to the residue. It appears to have been hurried through the committee with as much haste as it was attempted to be pushed through this House, and with as little consideration too. It strikes a fatal blow at the whole system, and although it faintly acknowledges the principle of protection, it leaves not one particle of protection to any one interest. My honorable friends who have preceded me have sufficiently proved this. I shall endeavor not to repeat their arguments. To commence with the cottons: Sir, how will they stand? It is, indeed, sir, fearful to think, to use the words of my enlightened and honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. APPLETON] how great interests are sported with in this enlightened Government! Why, sir, by this bill, which is advocated with a zeal almost amounting to indiscretion, by an honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means, who, be it remembered, is also, perhaps, the most ardent and zealous supporter of the administration on this floor, this vast interest, which has reached a degree of perfection not surpassed in the oldest manufacturing country, will be entirely prostrated.

It has been too often done to make it necessary for me now to go into all the details on this point. It is sufficiently evident to every one that, without a proper protection against the excessive capital of Great Britain, and the overshipments made under combinations such as are known to exist there, and at a great sacrifice of money, perfect as our establishments have become, they cannot stand. I will instance a case which is known to have occurred in 1826. At that time, sir, the manufacturers of Manchester thought the price of cotton too high. They determined, therefore, to lower it, and for this purpose called a meeting, at which two hundred firms were represented, none of which were worth less than 200,000 pounds sterling each. With the view to force the cotton holders to lower their price, they resolved not to work over half time, and, if necessary, only one-fourth time, and effectually carried their point.

Now, sir, what is to prevent similar combination from being made to effect the ruin of all our spinning establishments instantly? Place them on the footing of this bill, and it will be done. The above named 200 gentry, with their 50,000,000 sterling of capital, need only ship to this country, say 6,000,000 sterling of cotton yarns, at a loss of fifteen per cent., which would not amount to two per cent. on their capital, and their end is instantly effected. Ruin, far and wide, would ensue. And, Mr.

Chairman, I will add here, that even our Southern planter might in the end deeply deplore what he now so much seeks. Displace the 78,000,000 pounds of raw cotton, equal to 220,000 bales, of 360 pounds each, now consumed here by our own factories, whatever argument may be brought to the contrary, that would be deeply felt. But, further, this would be followed by the importation of goods made from an equal amount of cotton from Surat, Cutch, and thereabouts, the most inferior of all cottons, inevitably unless, by way of counteraction, the price of cotton is brought down to five or six cents; which I think, sir, can be but illy afforded. I would ask the honorable members from South Carolina to consider this matter maturely, and then say if they are prepared to aid in breaking up all our cotton factories, which now furnish so sure a market for their cottons, in preference to the coarse cottons of India. Besides, sir, was it not clearly proved to us last session by my honorable friend from Louisiana, [Mr. BULLARD], that they could raise there at least two pounds to one raised in Carolina? And does not this bill go to reduce the duty on sugar, another capital interest attacked by it; and does not this of necessity drive the sugar planter to the cultivation of cotton? I ask the Southern gentlemen to look well to this; to reflect calmly on this subject, and pause before it be too late.

An examination into the operation of this bill against the woollen interests, would result, Mr. Chairman, in a much more fearful exposure of its ruinous tendency. This, sir, as is well known, is the interest in which our Eastern brethren are so deeply engaged, and one, the destruction of which involves consequences much more widely to be felt than almost any other. In assailing it, you attack the household goods of the farmer, and wither the grass on many a green hill. You affect seriously a capital of at least one hundred and sixty millions of dollars, and destroy a profitable means of subsistence now afforded to at least one hundred and fifty thousand of your fellow-citizens. But, sir, this is not all. It is not only him who ploughs your soil whose industry is palsied by this your heedless, headlong, if not wicked action. The sailor, the weather-beaten mariner, he who carries your flag bravely over every sea, and displays it with honor in every clime—even he, who has added to your chaplet your brightest wreath of renown, must partake of the general doom. Independent of the intimate connexion between the full development of all your internal resources and your coasting trade, this woollen interest affords a main support to your whale fisheries, and produces to your navigation in freight, on the manufacture of every 100,000 pounds of wool, a sum equal to several hundred dollars.

In addition to the above, I must ask leave to submit a few facts of a highly important nature in reference to an article of the woollen manufacture but lately established, at great cost, on the faith of your own enactments, and which, under an ad valorem duty, unless a very high one, must go down. I allude to the manufacture of carpets.

It is believed that the amount of capital invested in this manufacture, in the United States, already exceeds one million of dollars, and the value of the goods annually manufactured probably exceeds that amount by four hundred thousand dollars.

The number of carpet looms now in actual operation in the United States is about six hundred and fifty, and the number of operatives employed in the business about thirteen hundred. Their wages amount to from two hundred and fifty thousand to three hundred thousand dollars annually.

It has been further ascertained that the carpet manufacturers in the United States annually worked up upwards of two millions of pounds of wool for wool alone, and about five hundred thousand pounds worsted yarn for warp.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Such already is the effect of competition in this article, that it is a well known fact, the prices in the United States have been uniformly lower since 1828, than at any former period—a result which has, in every case, been produced by high duties, as the prices on both iron, sugar, and salt, fully manifest. I cannot, therefore, consent, Mr. Chairman, that this vast interest should be sported with, even though, by its sacrifice, I am offered protection for another, no doubt, of equal importance. And here I must be allowed to say, that if there be any one part of this bill more offensive to me than another, it is the exemption from ruin made in favor of the interest to which I allude, in which Pennsylvania is supposed to be more particularly interested: I mean iron. I can hardly suppose it could have been imagined that so indigestible a bait as this would have been swallowed by the high-minded freemen of that State. If I know my honorable colleagues, they will reject it with the indignation it merits; for myself, sir, I turn my back upon it; and I am proud to state here, in my place, and to the world, that I have received a letter from one of the most distinguished iron masters of Pennsylvania, a gentleman of the highest standing for integrity and honor, and universally beloved for the manly frankness of his character, interested to a large amount in this business, in which he disclaims, totally, all exceptions in their favor, and asks, with an honorable patriotism, no other fate than such as was to be meted out to the whole body of the manufacturers. I could have wished, sir, that my venerable colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means had acted on the same principle: I could have wished that he had spared his colleagues the pain they must feel from an exemption from the common lot, by an exception in their favor of so questionable a character.

Mr. Chairman: I can assure the committee their patience is not more exhausted than my own strength: the lateness of the hour forbids my going as fully as I could wish into the several more important items of this bill. The people are sufficiently awake to the whole subject. Every mechanic art, the farmer, the merchant, the ship-builder, ay, sir, the shipbuilder, although under an honest but mistaken view, this highly intelligent and talented class of men, impute to the tariff a decline in their business, which, if it exists, springs from altogether different causes; the whole body of respectable freemen whose labor constitutes their chief capital, and forms so important an item in the general wealth, all, all are equally and deeply interested in the preservation of this system. All, all, sir, are equally interested in the preservation of a sound, just, and established system of legislation. All are or ought to be anxious to be preserved from sudden and violent reactions, produced from no matter what cause. My own district, as well as my State, Mr. Chairman, is essentially tariff. I know not exactly the amount of capital invested in manufacturing establishments in the district I am proud to represent; but, sir, it is vastly beyond what any one would believe, unless, like myself, he had examined and witnessed it. It is particularly incumbent, therefore, upon me to be circumspect in approaching this delicate and intricate question. I cannot allow myself to be driven into a hasty and precipitate conclusion. The friends of the administration who are the zealous advocates of this bill, must excuse me when I refuse to effect political ends by the wanton sacrifice of all I consider dear to my constituents and my country. And yet, Mr. Chairman, wrong as I think it would be to act at all at present, still, sir, if it had been deemed worth the while, I have no doubt that such a bill might have been submitted to this House, as would have met at least my approval, and would not have been injurious to the manufacturer.

I have no doubt, sir, that a reduction down to a uniform rate, with a view to satisfy the South, would have been readily submitted to, if it had been accompanied by certain provisions which would have proved a protection both against foreign capital and overshipments. Such protection would have been found in the establishment of the warehouse system; in limiting the period of deposit in the public stores to six months, at the end of which time the goods should either be re-exported or entered at once for home consumption; in the payment of cash duties, with interest from the arrival of the vessel; in the non-allowance of drawbacks if reshipped after the payment of the duty. Fix the duties at 25 per cent. on cost at the place of exportation, on all articles manufactured, in whole or in part, from any metal or metals, wool, cotton, flax, hemp, furs, leather, glass, earthen, salts, or juice of the cane. All other articles free, except spirits, which ought to be specific and high. With these provisions, I am even inclined to think the 20 per cent. now sought to be established would perhaps be preferred to the duties imposed by the act of July, 1832. Such, however, sir, is not the case; nor has any thing like the above been attempted. Widely, therefore, must any bill differ from the present, before it can receive my sanction. Greatly must the present one be amended, before I can be brought to view it even with common complacency.

It may not, Mr. Chairman, be deemed irrelevant for me, before I take my seat, to say something in reference to the amendment now under discussion, proposed by my honorable friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON.]

I confess, sir, I looked upon it as a strange anomaly, in a bill to reduce the revenue, to notice a clause reinstating the duties which had been so lately taken off from both the articles named, tea and coffee. Singular inconsistency! It strikes me as somewhat remarkable that the "motive" of this "financiere prudence" should have been created. Why, sir, was the committee aware of the amount of probable increase these two clauses would have brought to the treasury? I think not, sir. Indeed, it is certain they were not, as they have now themselves proposed to reduce it one-half. By a reference to the public documents, and to the best sources of information I can attain, it is probable that not less than fourteen millions of pounds of tea will be imported in the course of the present year; this, rated at an average of eight cents duties per pound, will yield to the treasury one million one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. In the year 1830, the imports of coffee were nearly fifty millions of pounds, of which thirteen millions were exported, leaving a balance over of thirty-seven millions of pounds. Assuming this as the probable amount, during the present year, of imports over exports, at a duty of one cent per pound, it will yield to the treasury three hundred and seventy thousand dollars, which, added to the amount of duty likely to accrue on teas, makes on the whole the large amount of one million four hundred and ninety thousand dollars, over and above the revenue likely to arise on the bill of 1832, which this bill for reducing the revenue is intended to supplant. A neat little sum, it must be confessed, Mr. Chairman, to extract from the pockets of the people on articles of absolute necessity, by way of precaution to cover any little financial errors on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir, I have done. I regret the necessity which has impelled me to detain the committee so long; but, sir, the paramount obligations which my duty to my country imposes on me at this time, have outweighed all other considerations. Whatever may be the fate of the great principles involved in the discussion before us, I shall be consoled with the idea that I have humbly, but I trust firmly, fulfilled my own duty. I shall vote, sir, in favor of the amendment offered by my honorable friend from Connecticut.

When Mr. W. had concluded, Mr. SLADE moved that the committee rise. Negatived: Yeas 63, nays 71; when

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. MUHLENBERG, of Pennsylvania, rose. I have not, said he, been in the habit of trespassing upon the patience of the House, or claiming its indulgence often. I hope I shall never do so, unless what is deemed duty to my country, to my constituents, to myself, shall seem imperiously to demand it. I will not say that I despise, but, sir, I dislike, extremely, exhibitions of this kind, when calculated, as they too generally are, more for effect elsewhere—abroad, at home, than here, where they should principally produce it. The assurance is, therefore, cheerfully given that neither you, Mr. Chairman, nor the committee over whose deliberations you have been called to preside, shall be detained for any length of time upon the subject now before it under consideration. The observations I intended to make, and which might have been extended to some length had I been so fortunate as to gain the floor at a seasonable hour of the day, shall, at this late hour of the evening, be condensed into the smallest possible compass—be made so brief that there shall be no complaint of unnecessarily consuming the time.

The constitutionality of the measure under consideration, its expediency, and even the quantum of protection or reduction deemed necessary, have been so amply and ably discussed, but a few months since, by the first men of the nation, that it would be great presumption in me to expect to throw any new light upon the subject, or to give it such an aspect as to change even the vote of one single reflecting individual of this body, and I should wish to change now else. We have, indeed, had so much of this subject at our last session, that a hope was justly cherished that it would not again be intruded upon us at this; yet it has come again. Some of us, it is true, exclaimed, in terror, "Shut, shut the door, good John; tie up the knocker; say I am sick, I am dead;" but it was in vain—to no purpose. The gates have been thrown wide open; here it is, with all its usual accompaniments, and must be met, "volens volens," whatever our feelings upon the occasion may be.

With these feelings and sentiments, Mr. Chairman, it is scarcely necessary to say that I have not risen to discuss the subject before you; its discussion is not necessary; it would be superfluous; no possible good could result from it. I have risen merely to justify the course I have heretofore taken in this respect, and shall hereafter take, and the vote I shall probably be called upon to place on record on the bill now under consideration.

The bill, I believe, is called a bill to reduce the revenue, and to modify the duty on imports: I do not exactly recollect the words used in the title; such, however, is its import. Well, sir, I am in favor of reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government, to give it an income only sufficient to meet its wants, calculated upon a fair and liberal scale. I am in favor of modifying the tariff, believing it not only called for by public opinion, but necessary, just, and expedient. I trust, also, that it can be so modified as to satisfy the reasonable portion of our Southern brethren; I say the reasonable portion, for I find there are unreasonable men there as well as in the eastern and middle sections of the Union. If I had wanted proof, I should find it in the explicit declaration made by the poetic, learned, and eloquent gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDS] last evening, that if the provision raising the duty upon tea and coffee, contained in the bill, were stricken out, he should vote against it. The tariff, I repeat it, may, in my humble judgment, be so modified as to satisfy the reasonable portion of the South, without bringing ruin and utter desolation on the eastern and middle sections of the Union; nay, I sincerely believe, without very essentially injuring them.

On these points, Mr. Chairman, I have little difficulty in my own mind, and, if I mistake not greatly, a decided majority of the people of the State I have the honor to represent, in part, upon this floor, will, at a proper period, when they have had time for reflection and examination, when an opportunity shall have been given them to express a deliberate opinion, be found of the same mind, to accord with me in sentiment. I may possibly be in error, I may possibly not know the feelings and sentiments of those among whom I have been born and bred, and with whom I have been all my life in habits of unrestrained intercourse; but if in error, I have as yet neither seen nor heard anything to convince me of it; but on these points I have little or no difficulty in my own mind. There are, however, Mr. Chairman, other difficulties in the way, which may not so easily be got over. Is this the proper time when the change should be made? Does the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, now on your table, suggest the best mode of effecting this change? Upon these points, sir, I have pondered often and often, in the calm of the morning, and in the silent hour of the night. They have been viewed from every side, in all their different possible bearings, and my mind has never been able to come to any other conclusion than that this is neither the proper time for making the change, nor the mode proposed by the bill before us the best for effecting it.

Permit me, sir, to say a few words upon these points, and I shall have performed my duty, not a very agreeable, but a necessary one. Gentlemen are continually telling us, it is every where sounding in our ears, "Now is the day, and now is the hour;" but, sir, I do not believe it. The aspect of the stars is not favorable; they declare the day as unfortunate, and the hour as an evil one, and I therefore say, Beware! beware! Touch not now: handle not now. And why not? Why, sir, every time I reflect upon the subject, a hundred, nay, a thousand reasons strike me. It is not necessary to detail them here at length; they are so evident that he who runs may and must read them. How many months have elapsed since we passed a bill upon this very subject? It was approved on the 14th of July last, I believe. How long were we engaged in maturing that bill? Some four or five months, if I mistake not. Has it as yet gone into operation? Can we positively say how it will operate; what its effects may be? Have we had any new light upon the subject since? None of any material consequence, I venture to assert; none but what should induce us, at least, to give it a trial. And now, sir, what are we doing? What are we about to do? Shall we act like children who build up card-houses merely that they may have the pleasure of blowing them over with the breath of their nostrils? Sir, I hope not. I trust we shall have more respect for ourselves—more respect for our constituents.

How could we justify such conduct before those constituents? Have they requested us to act upon the subject? Did they expect that we would venture to do so at the present session? Did they imagine, before we left them, that we would venture to undo what we had scarcely completed—what had not yet had a trial, and of the effects of which we could say nothing positive? I think not, sir. I am positive that they did not, as far as regards my own constituents at least. Have they since expressed an opinion upon the subject? Have they given us any instructions as regards this point? I believe not, sir. Here and there only a solitary voice has been heard. A few, a very few memorials only, from my own native State, have been presented, and it strikes me that these came in rather a questionable shape. Notwithstanding the great respectability of the signatures, and the deserved high standing of my friend who presented them, the nullifying source from which they appear to have emanated, and which probably set them in motion, may cause them to be regarded with some suspicion as to the purity of the motives by which they were dictated. Be this as it may, I must strongly question their speaking the sentiment of the State, as the Legislature, convened for a different purpose, it is true, by its resolutions, passed almost unanimously, has spoken in a direct contrary language. Here then, sir, if these things are to have weight with us, here is a voice from Pennsylvania; a voice not entitled to instruct—I admit I am rather jealous upon that point—a voice, however, which should be heard with great deference, because the same number of people that send one member to this House, send five members to the State Legislature.

But gentlemen will tell us the situation of things has changed since members of Congress have left their homes. The Union is in danger; blood will be shed; the Union will be destroyed unless we act, and act promptly. And what is this change that is to produce such direful consequences? I know of none, sir, but the attitude which South Carolina has lately assumed. What effect this may have upon some gentlemen, I cannot tell. Why it is brought into view at all, I know not. Perhaps Southern gentlemen may expect to gain from the fears of some what they could not well hope from their free, unbiassed judgment. Perhaps the same calculation is made upon "Northern dough faces," to be moulded as circumstances may require. I trust such is not the case; I sincerely hope it is not. Should such, however, be the case, let me assure gentlemen that they have mistaken their men—yes, sir, they have mistaken their men. If those days ever did exist, and I do not believe it, it was an unmerited aspersion; but if they did ever exist, they have passed away, never, never more to return. I trust, sir, we shall ever fear to do wrong, always fear to be unjust, always fear to injure and oppress our brethren, even if we had the power; but never, never fear to do what our judgment and conscience tells us is right, and our duty to do, be the consequences what they may.

What, sir! shall a handful of unruly spirits—I say it not in anger but in sorrow; I had almost said, of conspirators against the peace and dignity of the Union; but if I had, I should have been pardoned for using the phrase in the warmth of debate, as those who know me best, know that I have none but the kindest feelings towards the South, and have ever acted in accordance with those feelings, when imperative duty did not demand a different course—but, sir, shall a handful of unruly spirits compel a large majority of the States to give up a system upon which they have heretofore believed the best interests of the country depended? For nothing short of a total abolition of the protective system would seem to satisfy them. Shall a handful of unruly spirits compel a decided majority of the representatives of this great and free people to destroy this system without even taking time to consult their masters, the people, upon the subject? I would advise gentlemen to take counsel of their fears in this respect—to fear doing wrong in acting contrary to the well-known and expressed wishes of their constituents; of those constituents whose known will, I hold, they are bound to obey, or resign their situation as representatives.

Sir, let South Carolina gain her point, and what will be the consequence? Why, sir, those who, if I understand these proceedings correctly, have become nearly traitors to the Union, instead of being punished, not by steel or hémp, I desire no such means, but by the merited contempt of all parties, will be rewarded, and all their ambitious schemes will be in a fair way of being accomplished. Let South Carolina gain her point, and you escape one danger merely to fall into another and a greater. In steering clear of Charybdis, you strike upon Scylla. Resistance to the laws of the Union will become a common thing, an every day occurrence. But a few years will elapse, and, encouraged by the success of South Carolina, we shall find nearly every State in the Union, even Delaware and Rhode Island, nullifying; and, in order to act consistently, at every session of Congress you will be obliged to change or repeal the acts of the preceding one. What would our Union be worth under such circumstances? What would the passage of any law avail? Of what service would meetings of the representatives of the people be to consult upon the public welfare? I say, then, meet the crisis at once; meet it manfully and fearlessly. Put down opposition to the laws of the Union. Show only that you are determined to do so, and you will need neither sword, nor spear, nor buckler, nor musket, nor military array. The good sense of the people, the virtue and patriotism of the great mass of our Southern brethren, will effect all that can be desired. Why should we doubt it? Is not their own welfare and happiness; is not the welfare and happiness of their children and posterity, down to the latest ages; is not the liberty and happiness of the whole human family in the Western and Eastern hemisphere at stake?

But, sir, the time proposed for making an entire change in our impost system, not only appears to be an improper one; the mode suggested by the Committee of Ways and Means, for a reduction of the revenues by the bill now on your table, appears, in my humble judgment, equally so. It is unnecessary to enter into an examination of the details of this bill. It must at least assume a different shape before it can meet the approbation of my constituents. What this particular shape should be, is equally unnecessary to describe at this particular period. To mature it properly would seem to require much more time than can be given to it at the present short session of Congress, which must necessarily terminate on the 3d of March. Or is this law also to be changed or repealed again at the next session? Are we to build up another card castle, merely to blow it over again, when erected, for our own amusement?

While I am up, sir, and on this subject, I will however suggest an idea or two bearing on it. The amount of revenue calculated upon as arising from the public lands, say from two to three millions, evidently cannot be calculated upon as a permanent source of revenue. Why not strike it off then at once, as, if we are to submit to reductions, and very material reductions, we should at least be entitled to ask for and receive something permanent in return. This, sir, permanency in a system, I consider as of more importance than the mere amount of protection granted. Instead of raising the duty, as proposed in the bill, on tea, coffee, wines, silk, and other articles which we neither grow nor manufacture, and many of which have become absolute necessities of life to all classes of society, to the poor as well as to the rich, let them, if it be found necessary, be made entirely free, or admitted upon paying a mere nominal duty. Then raise such a revenue by imposts as may be necessary to supply the wants of the Government upon such articles as require protection, and the protection of which will encourage our agricultural pursuits and our domestic industry generally. In the agriculture, in the labor, in the industry of any nation, its real wealth must always be sought. Therein it will and must consist. Graduate, if you please, this protection, as the articles may be more or less necessary to our perfect independence in time of war, and I can imagine no real, no reasonable cause of complaint, either from the North or the South, the East or the West.

At a proper time, sir, I shall be in favor of a proper and judicious modification of the tariff; such a modification as shall completely reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, calculated upon a fair and liberal scale, such a scale as is becoming a great and free people. At a proper time, I shall be found willing, and, I doubt not, a majority of the people I have the honor to represent, in part, upon this floor, to give up something; nay, I will not say something, every thing, save our very existence, to satisfy our Southern brethren, to restore harmony, and preserve the Union. The Union is the first and greatest of all our national blessings, and to preserve it nothing can or ought to be esteemed too precious. I go for the Union, sir, the Union, the whole Union, and nothing but the Union. It must be preserved, peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must. To its preservation, firmness is however necessary in the representatives of the people, as moderation and forbearance. If we permit ourselves to be terrified by any clamor which is raised against its laws, it is gone, the Union is dissolved. Let us be just; never tax the people unnecessarily, equalize burdens and benefits as much as may be possible; let us, in this sense, be just and fear not, and all will be well.

I had intended, Mr. Chairman, to conclude with a Latin quotation. My mind has changed. I will leave that to those who delight in such things more than myself; I had almost said to the schoolmaster and schoolboys. Yet I might be considered as out of order, judging from the practice of a learned and eloquent gentleman, if I did not say something in an unknown tongue. I will therefore give you something of that kind. It shall not be in Latin or French, not in Greek or Hebrew, not in Arabic, Syriac, or Chaldean; it shall not be in the language of the Dane, or the Norman, of the Goth or the Visigoth, of the Hun or the Finn, but in the language of the Allemanni, of the children of Herman. I am, sir, a descendant of Germans, and I pride myself in having descended from that high-minded, generous, open-hearted, honest, intelligent, brave, unwavering, inflexible people, and will conclude with one of their sayings, taught me in early youth, and which has been, heretofore, as I trust it may ever continue, my guide and rule of conduct. The saying is, "Thue recht, fuerchte Gott, und scheu selbst den Teufel nicht." I might, Mr. Chairman, not be perfectly in order, judging from the example set me, if I did not translate what has been said in the unknown tongue. Be it so; I will give you both the letter and the spirit. Literally it is, "do what is right, trust in God, and fear not even the Devil." In spirit, it is the "be just and fear not" of our own people, expressed only in a more powerful and energetic language. I shall no longer trespass upon the indulgence of the committee, and am under many obligations for the marked and distinguished attention with which I have been heard.

Mr. ARNOLD, of Tennessee, followed, and spoke till nine o'clock, when he yielded to a motion that the committee rise. The motion prevailed, and the House adjourned. The following are the remarks of Mr. A. entire:

Mr. ARNOLD said he thought they were not quite ready to take the question yet. He said, if he had no other reason for not wishing the question to be then taken, the temper which the committee had displayed to-night, was, with him, a sufficient one. Sir, said Mr. A., what have we witnessed here? Why, sir, an excitement which has worked us up almost into a riotous mob. Under such feelings, was it proper for them to pass judgment upon any subject, much less upon the all-absorbing one then before the committee; one upon the decision of which he verily believed the fate of this republic depended? He called upon gentlemen to pause before they made this rash and disastrous plunge which they seemed so desirous to make. From the deportment of gentlemen upon this floor to-night, they certainly have forgotten what is due to themselves and to the American people, if not to those who are opposed to the present measure. Sir, I take the liberty to remind gentlemen that they are the representatives of freemen, and that they have been selected for the purpose of discharging many weighty and difficult questions here, that require wisdom, fidelity, and untiring patience. Have they displayed these essential attributes to-night? I regret, sir, that I am constrained to say they have not. On the contrary, I think they have exhibited themselves on the very reverse side of this aspect. They seem disposed to rush upon this question as the tiger springs upon his prey. If gentlemen have no respect for others, they should have some for themselves and for the station which they fill. Whether it be so or not, the presumption is, that this House is composed of men of talents, of integrity, and honor. After the picture, Mr. Chairman, which I have here drawn, and which you and every member upon this floor must know and feel falls short of the reality; after what we have witnessed here to-night, it would seem like a heartless task to set about gravely discussing one of the greatest questions which can here be agitated. Sir, there is no man who feels more forcibly the difficulty which lies in his way than I do; yet I will, even now, at this late hour, and in the midst of this turmoil and confusion, make the attempt to discharge that duty which I feel I owe to my constituents and to my country; in one word, I am determined, let others act as they may, to do my duty, and then trust to my God.

If any gentleman upon this floor can approach this question with clean hands, uncontaminated by unholly ambition, or by the prospect of individual gain or local advantage, I think I may safely say I can. Although my constituents believe that they have a deep stake in the question, yet they feel that its immediate and direct effect upon them is as little as it will be upon any other portion of their brethren in the United States. But, sir, my constituents do not limit their views of political economy to the termination of that horizon which is the extent of natural vision; they have a political eye which surveys this mighty republic from one end to the other; and they have taught me to use this eye when I am called to act in this hall. They have been accustomed to look at things upon a large scale. Sir, the very scenery by which they are every where surrounded, imparts to them expansion of intellect, and an unsubdued feeling of elevated and extended patriotism, which grasps their whole country. They are familiar with the mountain that rises swelling into the clouds; with the majestic river which rolls its ample flood to the ocean; with wide-spreading and luxuriant valleys which teem with rich rewards to him who ploughs them. Thus situated, my constituents are contented, and, I verily believe, as happy as it falls to the lot of mortals to be. They are devoted to their country, and to its constitution and laws. They hold them sacred as they do the apple of their eye. Nothing can arouse them more quickly than to hear of a meditated assault upon the institutions of their country, which were built up by the fathers of the revolution, and under which they have grown and flourished so happily. They bear all the burdens of Government most cheerfully. They pay their taxes; and, when a foreign foe invades their soil, they buckle on the habiliments of war, and fly to the standard of their country, to repel him, or die in the attempt. They hold their lives as dust in the balance, when weighed against their liberty and their country's honor. Representing such constituents, I should feel that I was false to them, and unworthy of them, if I did not make known the sentiments and views which, if they were present, would be proclaimed in a voice of thunder. I shall, therefore, proceed to discuss this question as though it were noon, and as though gentlemen were perfectly patient and desirous to hear me. Their want of patience is one grand reason with me why I choose to tax it on this occasion. I think speeches to-night, however wide of the mark, are preferable to votes.

What then, sir, does the bill now under consideration propose to do? Why, sir, it is a very modest little proposition, which proposes to do nothing more than to subvert and destroy that system of protection to American industry which is coeval with the Government itself—a system for which our fathers expended their treasure and shed their blood; a system without which inde-

My first inquiry shall be, was this system established in wisdom at the beginning? Preliminary, however, to answering this question, I will state a fact which is matter of well authenticated history, and will not be disputed by any body. It is this: There is no nation which has reached any degree of eminence, in either agriculture, commerce, or manufactures, but has had the protective system incorporated into their laws. England, as I will show in the sequel, protects her home industry by a duty upon all our principal staples, which excludes them almost entirely from her markets. But more of this after a while. The question now is, was the system of protecting our own farmers and mechanics a wise one at the beginning? I think I need state but a few of the names and opinions of those who founded it, to ensure the ready assent to the affirmative of this proposition by every true American. At the head of my list stands proudly pre-eminent the father of his country.

As early as December, 1796, General Washington used the following short and pithy interrogatory, by way of asserting a proposition:

Even at this early period of our history, General Washington saw and felt the importance of being independent of foreign Powers for every thing that was essential to our comfort or prosperity. He saw that, when we pursued nothing but agriculture and commerce, it was liable to be interrupted in a thousand ways; war, for instance, or any other whim of the monarchs with whom we were carrying on commerce, would put an end to it, and we should be thrown back upon our own resources, wholly unprepared for the shock. He saw, under this system of free trade, as it is now called, that, for months, and for years at a time, our vessels would be compelled to lay at anchor, and our agricultural products to rot in our barns. How was this distressing state of things to be avoided? Why, by establishing the “American system,” of making every thing within ourselves, and always taking care to sell more than we bought; by diversifying employment; by withdrawing a part of our capital and labor from commerce and agriculture, and devoting it to home manufactures; thereby furnishing ourselves with the necessaries of life, and at the same time creating a steady home market for a vast amount of agricultural products. Thus we should be wholly independent of all foreign Powers; and unless we could carry on commerce with them upon principles of equality, we would not carry it on at all. Their wars and revolutions might rage with the utmost fury, we could still carry on our system; but, upon the other principle, every little disturbance in Europe produced distress and ruin here. Mr. Jefferson said, in 1808:

“The suspension of our commerce, [just as General Washington had said it would be,] produced by the injustice of the belligerent Powers, and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have been forced, has compelled us to employ a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufacturing improvements; and little doubt remains, that the establishments formed, and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent.”

In 1816, he wrote to a friend thus:

“That, to be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or go without them, at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures, must be for reducing us either to a dependence on that nation, or be clothed in skins, and live like wild beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say I am not one of them.”

Thus, Mr. Chairman, you see Mr. Jefferson, the great founder of republicanism, was decidedly in favor, not only of protecting duties, but even of prohibition. I hope his professed followers here, (and gentlemen must excuse me for qualifying the term, for I do not believe any gentleman, who is opposed to protecting American industry, is a true disciple of Thomas Jefferson,) I say, I hope his professed followers here will note this fact, that Thomas Jefferson, from whom they all pretend to have imbibed their political creed, was himself a high, yea, an ultra protectionist. He felt and expressed himself as every American should.

Mr. Madison, in 1809, held this language:

“That it is not unworthy of reflection, that the arbitrary edicts of contending nations to obstruct our trade with them, have, so far, abridged our means of procuring the productions and manufactures of which our own is now taking their place.”

In his message of 1815 he said:

“There is no subject which can enter with greater force into the deliberations of Congress, than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence in the United States during the European wars.”

So you see, sir, Mr. Madison thought that no subject could enter with greater force into the deliberations of Congress. What higher commendation could he bestow upon the “American system,” than this? None. He had seen our commerce driven from the ocean. He had seen our ships rotting in our docks, and our corn and wheat rotting in our granaries. He saw us destitute of many of the necessaries of life. He had seen our soldiers in the late war freezing for the want of blankets and other necessary clothing. These were lessons of experience which he has never forgot.

In 1821 Mr. Monroe recommended the subject to Congress; and in his message to this body, in 1823, he said:

“I recommend a review of the tariff, for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defence and independence of our country.”

Now, sir, I have given you the opinions of four of the most illustrious citizens that this or any other country has ever produced. And what is remarkable, they were all born south of the Potomac; were all raised, and lived, and died, south of the Potomac. After this, sir, that the “American system” should meet with opposition south of the Potomac, and, especially, that it should meet with opposition in old Virginia, to me is matter of profound astonishment, and, unaffectedly, I say, of deep regret.

I have shown the committee now what the opinions of these distinguished citizens were from time to time. I will now show you what was Virginia sentiment among the bulk of the people at home.

every citizen who is not a hardened tory, and who would well deserve a full suit of British broadcloth, well 'tarred and feathered.'

"AN ASSOCIATOR OF '74."

I will read you now, sir, an extract of an address of Charles Magill, L. A. Washington, and others, to the farmers of Frederick county:

"Farmers: We propose to have a meeting on the 4th of July, at ten o'clock, at Mr. Baldwin's wool factory, near Perkins's mills, in this county, for the purpose of forming some plan for improving the breed of sheep. The golden opportunity of taking this first step towards the encouragement of domestic manufactures, ought certainly to be embraced by all those Americans who value the independence of their country."

I will now read an extract or two from a fourth of July celebration in Goochland county.

The company were generally dressed in Virginia cloth. Among the regular toasts was the following:

"Domestic Manufactures.--They well co-operate with our republican system to perpetuate the blessings of independence."

This, sir, was a regular toast; and the understanding is, on such occasions, that a regular toast expresses the sentiment of the whole company.

The next extract which I shall read, is a very high and very just compliment paid to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, who sits before me. I make this extract not in the spirit of a parasite to flatter my friend, but I do it to show that, in those days of true American feeling in Virginia, she could admire and bear witness to talent and virtue wherever found, even on the north of the Potomac. They, on the occasion referred to, usher in the name of my honorable friend with this sentiment:

"John Quincy Adams.--So long as the Temple of Liberty is worshipped in America, may the part he acted while in the Senate of the United States be hailed with rapture and delight."

The following toast is taken from the fourth of July celebration in Mecklenburg:

"The manufacturing genius of our countrymen. The wrongs of Britain first roused it; the aggressions of France will continue it; and the patriotism of our citizens will reward it."

We are now about to "reward it," by prostrating it and them at the feet of British power, and by sending their wives and children beggars upon a cold and uncharitable world. Yes, sir, I feel authorized to say, that, if this bill pass, it will work the complete overthrow and ruin of the whole system, which has been gradually building up ever since the foundation of the republic.

At the celebration in Amelia, I find the following most excellent sentiment among the general toasts:

"Domestic Manufactures.--Without them no nation can be truly independent."

The next toast which I will read pays to my friend another, and, if any thing, a higher compliment than that which I have previously read. It ascribes to him (and I verily believe most justly) a cardinal virtue in a politician, and which I regret much to say, sir, so few possess in these times:

"John Quincy Adams.--The patriot who preferred his country to his party: the passing cloud will make his brightness more conspicuous and valued."

I have no doubt but this will be the judgment of posterity--the high eulogium which they will pass upon his whole political life--"He preferred his country to his party."

The next and only extract which I will read is from the Richmond Enquirer of July 5, 1808:

"Yesterday was celebrated in this city with its customary honors. One of the most striking parts of the spectacle of this day was the large number of Virginia cloth suits which adorned [mark, sir, they adorned] the persons of our citizens. It was a badge for the consolation and encouragement of the belligerent Powers of Europe. Upon this homespun, enthusiasm and the spirit of independence have stamped all the value, all the pride of ornament. Many of their manufactures, although obtained at a very short notice, were handsome specimens of what our skill is competent to accomplish. When the use of our own cloth shall become the fashion of the State, as it is rapidly becoming, the wheels and looms of Virginia will not be deficient in the fineness and elegance of European fabrics."

Now, sir, after all this, who can doubt the paternity of the "American system?" Is it not old Virginia's legitimate offspring? If she has a descendant upon the face of the earth, this is one. She conceived it--she brought it forth.

Now, if Washington had wisdom and love of country, then this system was founded in wisdom and love of country. If Jefferson had wisdom and love of country, then this system was built up, and carried to its present height, by wisdom and love of country. In short, if Madison, if Monroe, if the whole shining constellation of Virginia statesmen, who gave her the elevated standing which she once had, were endowed with wisdom and virtue, then this system was founded in wisdom and virtue.

But, sir, for the sake of argument, I will suppose that it was originally founded in error, and that it has been left to us, in 1833, to find it out. What shall now be done? Will it be either wise or honest in us to abolish it, and to abolish it without premeditation or consultation with our constituents? For, sir, I have met with no man who has had the hardihood to say that, when he left home, his constituents expected that this question would be agitated at this session. Even supposing, for argument's sake, that the system had been conceived in error, I say it would be unwise and dishonest in us now to abolish it. In order to ensure a universal concurrence in this position, I think I need but state a few leading facts.

The laws which have been passed by Congress were intended to invite men of capital and of skill to embark in this business. I say the laws were intended to invite them; and at every consecutive step which we have made, the faith of the nation was most solemnly pledged that they should be protected against foreign competition.

Under these oft repeated pledges, the capital, the skill, and labor of our most patriotic and worthy citizens have been embarked to a very large amount.

The aggregate capital which is now vested in domestic manufactures is, at least, two hundred and fifty millions. To destroy this capital alone, without considering any of its attendant evils, would produce a shock upon society that would be felt--convulsively felt--from one extremity of this Union to the other. But I will proceed with some additional facts. And I will take this occasion to say, that my most material facts are derived from the reports of the New York convention. These facts have, for some time, been before the public. They are the result of patient examination made by our own citizens, not foreigners, whose opinions I have heard read upon this floor to teach us political economy. No, sir! I will not get our rivals in England to give me advice. I choose to take it from our own citizens, who are perfectly familiar with the whole business. The facts which these intelligent and responsible American citizens have put forth, and signed with their own names, have never, that I have seen or heard, been controverted in one jot or tittle. If they are not true, and can be controverted, I should be much pleased to hear some gentleman do so upon this floor.

The first branch of American industry to which I will call the attention of the committee, is that of iron. My first business under this head will be to show that the duty on foreign iron has not raised the price to the consumer, but that it has caused a very considerable reduction.

STATEMENT C,

Showing the effects of a tariff of protection on the article of iron at Pittsburg and Cincinnati.

In the years 1818, '19 and '20, bar iron in Pittsburg sold at from 190 to 200 dollars per ton. Now the price is 100 dollars per ton.

In the same years, boiler iron was 350 dollars per ton. Now at 140 dollars per ton.

Sheet iron was but little made in those years, and sold for 18 dollars per cwt. Now made in abundance, and sold at 8½ dollars per cwt.

Hoop iron, under same circumstances, was then 250 dollars, and is now 120 dollars.

Axes were then 24 dollars per dozen, and are now 12 dollars.

Scythes are now 50 per cent. lower than they were then—as are spades and shovels.

Iron hoes were in those years 9 dollars per dozen. Now a very superior article of steel hoes at 4 to 4½ dollars.

Socket shovels are made at 4½ dollars by the same individual who, a few years ago, sold them at 12 dollars per dozen.

Slater's patent stoves, imported from England, sold in Pittsburg at 350 to 400 dollars. A much superior article is now made there, and sold for 125 to 150 dollars.

English vices then sold for 20 to 22½ cents per lb. Now a superior article is sold at 10 to 10½.

Braziers' rods in 1824 were imported, and cost 14 cents per lb. or $313 60 per ton. Now supplied to any amount of ½ to ¾ diameter, at 130 dollars per ton.

Steam engines have fallen in price since 1823 one-half, and they have one-half more work on them.

The engine at the Union rolling mill, (Pittsburg,) in 1819, cost 11,000 dollars. A much superior one, of 130 horse power, for Sligo mill, cost, in 1826, 3,000.

In 1830, there were made in Pittsburg one hundred steam engines.

In 1831, one hundred and fifty will be made, averaging 2,000 dollars; or 300,000 in that article alone.

A two horse power engine costs 250 dollars; six horse, 500 dollars; eight to nine horse, 750 dollars. These last are the prices, delivered and put up.

At least 600 tons of iron made in Pittsburg are manufactured into other articles before it leaves the city, from steam engines of the largest size, down to a threepenny nail.

Eight rolling and slitting mills, of the largest power, are in the city of Pittsburg, five of which have been erected since 1828.

Thirty-eight new furnaces have been erected since 1824 in the western parts of Pennsylvania, and that part of Kentucky bordering on the Ohio river; most of them since 1828.

The quantity of iron rolled at Pittsburg was—

1829,	"	6,217	17	0	0
1830,	"	9,282	2	0	0

Being an increase of nearly 200 per cent. in two years.

The above facts were furnished by members of the committee residing at Pittsburg, who vouch for their accuracy.

One fact there stated suggests the following remarks to the committee:

To the report of the select committee of the Senate of the United States, on the subject of iron, is appended, among other papers, one in which it is stated that "it is now ascertained that the superiority of England over France is entirely due to the cheapness of iron: a six horse steam engine, for instance, in France, costs, on the average, at least 500 dollars more than in England, owing to the cheapness of iron in Great Britain. It is still dearer in the United States than in France.

Here it is asserted that a six horse power steam engine costs 500 dollars more in France than it does in England, and that it is still dearer in the United States than in France. Now it so happens, that in the United States, at Pittsburg, a steam engine, of that power, can be put up, ready for action, for the identical sum of 500 dollars.

Prices of Iron at Cincinnati.

1827, do	120	to	130	do.
1827, do	115	to	125	do.
1829, do	112½	to	122½	do.
1830, do	100	to	110	do.
1831, do	100	to	110	do.

Castings, including hollow ware, 1814 to 1818, 120 to 130 dollars per ton: present price, 60 to 65, and the quality much improved.

STATEMENT D.

The duties on iron imported into the United States were, in 1804 to 1812, 15 per cent.; double war duties from 1812 to 1816. In 1816, duties, rolled iron, 30 dollars per ton: hammered, nine dollars. The law of 1816, fixing the duties at these rates, ruined many of the manufacturers, and compelled them to abandon their works. By the act of April 20, 1818, the duty on hammered iron was raised to 15 dollars. This, in some measure, revived the manufacture, and many who had abandoned, resumed their operations. The foreign manufacturer, to keep possession of the market, offered his iron at a less price; so that there was an actual decline here. In 1824, the duty on hammered iron was raised to 18 dollars, and in 1828 to $22 40. These additions to the duty had no permanent effect in raising the price. The foreign manufacturer could not advance his prices beyond those of 1824, because the American iron maker supplied the market at those rates; and iron at a duty of $22 40, sells at less than it did at one of nine dollars. The foreign manufacturer has been compelled to take the additional duties from his profits, and these deductions from his profits have been paid into the treasury of the United States, without adding to the price paid by the American consumer.

The following table shows the operation of the additional duty levied since 1818 on hammered iron alone.

The Tariff Bill.

[JAN. 24, 1833.]

STATEMENT E.

The following calculations were made by Hardman Phillips and George Valentine, and are derived from the average returns submitted to the committee from two counties, those most extensively engaged in the manufacture of iron in Pennsylvania, namely Centre and Huntingdon, and have been carefully verified by a comparison with returns from 73 furnaces and 132 forges.

For each ton of bar iron and castings made, the following agricultural produce is found to be consumed:

57 lbs. pork - - - - - 5 "	2 85
43 lbs. beef - - - - - 4 "	1 72
10 lbs. butter - - - - - 12½ "	1 25
2 bushels potatoes - - - - - 30 "	60
½ ton hay - - - - - $7	3 50

For every ten tons of bar iron, one horse is employed one whole year, worth 100 dollars, and experience shows that the mortality among horses so employed is, per annum, one in seven, and constitutes a charge per ton of

For fruit and vegetables, of which no return has been made, we feel justified in putting down

Which, multiplied by the quantity of bar iron and castings, will give the sum of 3,415,850 dollars, paid by the iron manufacturers, and those employed by them, to the farmers.

The same returns enable them to state that every five tons of iron, as above made, requires one able-bodied man throughout the year, or, in the whole, 24,979; and, as it appears that, upon an average, each one of these has four dependent upon him, it follows that 124,895 persons are supported by this branch of industry, in its first stages; and the average of the wages of the workmen being fully one dollar per day, or say 300 per annum, they receive for wages, in the whole, the large sum of 7,493,700 dollars for the labor of one year.

The expense of transporting this iron to the different markets, by land and water, may be estimated at an average of ten dollars per ton, amounting to 1,248,940 dollars; the whole of which is distributed among those engaged in the transportation and coasting trade of the country, and subdivided among those who furnish subsistence to the many persons employed, and in furnishing means for this branch of the business.

These facts show conclusively that the consumer gets a better article, and at a lower price, than he did before protection was extended to this branch of industry.

This, sir, I feel warranted in saying, falls very far short of the full amount of this business. There are several furnaces and forges, within my knowledge, which do a very considerable business, and which are not here enumerated.

But, sir, take the iron business as here stated, and abolish it, and what will be the effect upon society? You destroy one hundred and twelve thousand eight hundred and sixty-six tons of bar iron, and one hundred and ninety-one thousand and thirty-six tons of pig iron. Do you think this would not be likely to raise the price of iron to the consumer? I will not answer this question, but will leave it with the American farmers and mechanics to judge.

But this aspect of the case is not the beginning of the evil which the community are doomed to suffer from this rash, precipitous, and blind legislation. The annual product of iron in the United States is estimated to be worth thirteen million three hundred and twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars, which, if the business fails, is stricken out of existence, and is so much clear loss every year to the wealth of the nation. You deprive, moreover, twenty-nine thousand two hundred and fifty-four laborers and mechanics of the employment by which they earn their daily bread for themselves and families! You deprive one hundred and forty-six thousand two hundred and seventy-three souls of subsistence, until those on whom they depend can seek a new channel for their labor. In the mean time there must be great and universal suffering. You throw out of circulation eight million seven hundred and seventy-six thousand four hundred and twenty dollars in wages paid to the laborers. Is this all? No, sir. You take from the farmers four million four hundred and ninety dollars, which they receive annually from the iron manufacturers for agricultural products!!

Now, how will these arrangements work? What is to become of the twenty thousand laborers who are to be thrown out of the iron employment? At least nineteen-twentieths of them will be driven into agriculture, which is already able to overstock the market. The farmers will be deprived of a market where they have been able to send upwards of four millions worth of produce. Thus will this ruinous policy cut upon the farmer like a two-edged sword. The supply of agricultural products will be greatly increased, and the demand for them diminished to an amount of at least four millions. Sir, if a more ruinous state of things could be devised for the farmer, Pandora, the goddess of evil, must do it. And why are our establishments to be broken down? Why are our citizens to be thrown out of employment? Why are we to be hid low at the feet of British power? Is it that we are to get iron cheaper? No! For we get it cheaper now than we ever have before. Are we to get better iron? No, we get better iron now than we ever did before. Why, then, sir, in the name of Heaven, is this sweeping desolation to be brought upon the country?

The same remarks will apply to all our manufacturing establishments. Iron is left in a better condition than any of them, and those who are best acquainted with that subject say it cannot stand if the present bill pass. If iron cannot stand, then, what is to become of woolens and other interests, which have a protection so far below that of iron? Why, as a matter of course, they must be prostrated immediately, and at once. I will, therefore, attempt to show the committee the amount of capital in a few other branches of American industry, and which, if this bill pass, might as well be thrown into the ocean. I will also show the number of persons employed, and the number dependent upon these institutions for the bread they eat. As it will not be in my power to review every branch, I will take a few which will bring the question home directly to every man's bosom and fireside.

But before I leave this subject, as the manufacturers are charged with making most enormous profits, let us look a little into the accusation.
